MINUTES OF EVIDENCE.

Tuesday, 24th May 1870.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Bourke.	Sir John Ogilvy.
Mr. Cogan.	Mr. O'Reilly.
Mr. George Gregory.	Mr. Pease.
Mr. Howes.	Mr. Pemberton.
Mr. Jessel.	Mr. Sherlock.
Mr. Matthews.	Mr. John Gilbert Talbot.
Mr. Newdegate.	Mr. Villiers.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE CHARLES PELHAM VILLIERS, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. PETER ERLE, was called in; and Examined.

1. Chairman.] ARE you the Chief Commissioner of the Charity Commission?—I am.

2. And you have been so from the time of its establishment?—I have.

3. Could you shortly explain to the Committee what are precisely the duties of the Commissioners with respect to charities?—It is a large question; we collect information respecting them; we receive their accounts, which are important means of that information; we have now the power of appointing trustees, and establishing schemes for the management of charities, and we control the administration of their estates; we can empower the trustees to improve them to sell, to lease, and to make securities. We exercise a very general supervision over charities.

4. You derive your power from an Act of Parliament?—From several Acts of Parliament.

5. Was not the first Act which constituted your board passed in the year 1853?—Yes, in 1853.

6. By referring to the Act, I suppose we can see the exact extent and nature of your duties, and of your jurisdiction?—That Act founded our duties and powers, but they have been considerably enlarged by later Acts, particularly by an Act of 1860, more than any other Act. The Act of 1853 and the Act of 1860 give us our principal powers.

7. But do we understand that under the Act of 1853 you have power to inquire into every charity, or every endowment for charitable purposes in this country?—Yes, the Act of 1853 empowered us to do so, speaking generally; there are many special exemptions.

8. Was not the purpose to inquire into the state and condition and nature of those charities?—As far as relates to their endowments.

9. Then there were certain exemptions with respect to persons professing peculiar religions?—The charities only of the Roman Catholics were temporarily exempted.

10. Were they distinctly exempted in that Act?—Yes, they were exempted until 1860.

11. Practically, it was not intended to exempt them for more than two or three years?—No; but there was a succession of Acts continuing the exemption, until it finally ceased in 1860.

12. But with respect to all other charitable uses, that is to say, uses connected with other religious persuasions, have you complete jurisdiction under the Act of 1853?—That is so.

13. Have you the power of initiating an inquiry whenever you hear of a charity, or is there an obligation imposed upon the trustees of charities to communicate with the board?—We can initiate inquiries if we obtain even accidental information. The trustees are not required to communicate with the board.

14. Did you take any means of acquiring information with respect to the charities throughout the country?—Not universally. We have a very small staff of inspectors, who cannot pervade the country. We acquire a very extended knowledge of charities, but cannot ascertain its absolute completeness from a variety of sources.

15. Notice, perhaps, is given by the charities to the board of their existence, with a readiness expressed to submit to their jurisdiction?—It may be either by the administrators or by persons who are dissatisfied with the administration of the charities. Any members of the public, and especially any persons who are dissatisfied with the administration of endowments, can give us notice.

16. Before your inquiry into the proper administration of those charities, in a large proportion of cases you receive notices of their existence, which originate with themselves?—Our principal source of information as to the existence of charities is derived from the reports made under Lord Brougham's Commissions, contained in upwards of 30 folio volumes.

17. Has that taken place since 1853?—Those reports are the principal source of our knowledge of endowments to their date. The last was made in 1837.

18. That is to say, you derive your knowledge from some evidence that has been recorded before-hand?—Yes, to a considerable extent.

19. But your information, since you have been constituted, has been virtually derived from notice sent to you by the trustees, or from the reports made by your own inspectors?—We constantly extend our knowledge by these means, but one principal source of our information, which would be most effectual, if we could make it complete, is the return which the administrators of all charities are bound to render to us annually of their receipts and administration of the income of the endowments.

20. Is there any obligation on the part of persons administering trusts to communicate with the board?—There is the obligation to which I have just referred, but it is extremely difficult to enforce it generally; we never have obtained any complete return of the accounts of all endowed charities; if we get the accounts of 18,000 or 20,000 charities in a year, we consider that a fair number.

21. You are speaking of the operation of the Act during the exemption of Catholics?—I speak of the operation of the Act generally.

22. Do you observe that there is any sort of reluctance or unwillingness on the part of Protestant charities to be placed in communication with the board?—I think, certainly not, except that many trustees object to make due returns of their accounts, and this obligation can be enforced only by the intervention of the Court of Chancery.

23. But those are in cases where there is no exemption?—Yes; there being no exemption.

24. And the operation of the Act, as regards Protestant charities, was, that they felt themselves obliged to render account of their charities to the board?—That duty is imposed upon them by the law.

25. Is there any clear and definite recognition of what is a charity by the board?—We are obliged to consider that question constantly; but it seldom presents difficulty.

26. But does your jurisdiction consider the destination of a fund; that is to say, if a man left endowment to be devoted to a religious purpose, should you consider that to be a charitable purpose?—Yes.

27. And coming within your jurisdiction?—Yes, clearly; we deal with many endowments for different religious denominations.

28. You do not include in the definition of charity all religious purposes; that is to say, you do not consider that wherever there is a religious purpose it is necessarily a charitable purpose?—Yes, if there is an endowment applicable by trustees. An endowment for a minister of the Established Church in aid of his income, if it is vested in trustees, is technically a charity; and we deal with many endowments for the ministers of different Dissenting communities as charities.

29. Mr. Pemberton.] They are charities within your jurisdiction?—Yes, entirely so; endowments for the maintenance of churches and similar objects are clearly charities.

30. Chairman.] With reference, however, to the state of the law respecting conventual and monastic institutions, had the Catholics not been exempted from this Act, you would have inquired into any endowments that were applied to the support of those institutions?—We should have had power to do so. There is a much greater number of charities than we can keep up with, if I may so express myself; and therefore our action is very much confined to those which are the subjects of some application to us. I think that the application of no Roman Catholic charities has been brought before us as matter of dissatisfaction existing in any quarter.

31. Roman Catholic institutions being exempt, you never initiated any inquiry with respect to them; but you spoke of another Act, the Act of 1860, which purported to afford relief to Roman Catholic charities, or at least to persons interested in them; have you since that made them the subject of inquiry?—Not at all generally; we have the most imperfect information as to any Roman Catholic endowments.

32. Have they not volunteered to communicate with the board for the purpose of accounts being taken?—I think, none. The managers of a few have come to us for special purposes. They have wished to avail themselves of our powers to facilitate alienations of their property, and like purposes, but not for general objects; only a very small number have applied to us for any purpose.

33. Could you have acted unless any endowments affecting their institutions had been enrolled?—Yes.

34. You require enrolment, do not you, before you act?—Under the general law, charitable endowments consisting of realty in England, if made after the ninth year of George II., must be enrolled in Chancery. We have no discretionary powers with reference to that Act; it is part of the general law of the land, and affects settlements of real estate only.

35. But what was the particular relief that was given to Catholics under the Act of 1860, if it had no reference to enrolment?—It gave them this relief, with specific reference to enrolment. It may be said that no Catholic charities had been enrolled. Almost all Catholic endowments, while the penal laws were in force, were clandestine, and necessarily so. There were hardly any declarations of the actual trusts, but grants of land were made, and the intended trusts being secret were not declared by any deed which could be enrolled for giving them validity. When the Act of 1860 passed, facility was then given to the administrators of Roman Catholic charities harities to enrol them with the same effect as f they had been enrolled at the time of their reation, so as to give them the same validity. I think there were about 400 enrolments made n a short time, but the instruments so enrolled vere generally very imperfect.

36. After the passing of that Act Roman Catholics availed themselves of that provision, and enrolled their deeds to the number of 400? —Yes. I am not accurate as to the number, but those enrolments scarcely gave any information. The deeds contained grants of land, but no declarations of the trusts, and afforded no means of ascertaining who were the trustees, or even what were the purposes of the grants; they were enrolled as grants for charitable purposes, but those purposes were not declared.

37. What could have been the purpose of enrolment?—I do not perceive that it was effectual for any purpose. The Act of Geo. 2 avoided all settlements to charitable purposes of land unless enrolled, and the enrolment of only grants of land, without any declaration of the trusts, was imperfect; it did not show the settlement for any charitable purposes.

38. Do you read the Act as limiting the time after which enrolment was precluded, or is there always power now to cure defects by enrolment? — There was a period of 12 months; the special provision of that Act which applied to Roman Catholic charities was confined to one year. There have been subsequent Acts as to all charities. Lord Cranworth introduced several Acts extending the time for enrolment of charities generally; and ultimately it was enacted that enrolments may be made after any time on application to the Court of Chancery for special permission.

39. It is either one way or the other; either the time expires for enrolment, or by successive Acts the power of enrolment has been continued; can you tell the Committee how that is? — I am not quite sure at this moment as to Roman Catholic charities, but I think there would be power under Lord Cranworth's last Act of applying to the Court of Chancery for leave to enrol a deed of any date.

40. Have any enrolments taken place under Lord Cranworth's Act?—I do not know as to Catholic charities.

41. Has any search been made lately?—Not from our office; the Enrolment Office is a very difficult office to search; I do not think there has been any great number of enrolments of charities.

42. Has there been any enrolment of other charities not Roman Catholic?—Yes; I know that there have been some.

43. It is not the Act of 1861, is it, that you refer to?—No; it is a more recent Act, the 29 & 30 Vict.

44. I conclude, from what you have stated, that you have no means of knowing the number of endowments, affecting Roman Catholic charities, existing in the country, or that have been created since the Act of 1853?—No, we are entirely without any material information respecting them.

45. Are you under no obligation to seek that information?—We are under no obligation, except that it is part of our duty to occupy ourselves always fully on the duties in our office; and our attention is very much confined to cases in which representations are made to us, but scarcely any Roman Catholic charities have been brought before us. In the result we have little or no knowledge of them.

46. There has been no communication made to you on the part of Catholics, complaining of the administration of any charity?—Scarcely any. There was one case in Northumberland, in which some complaint was made, but the facts were obscure. In another case there was a dispute as to who should be the depository of funds, but no complaint of their application.

47. You have no reason to suppose that there is any general mal-administration of Catholic charities?—No; I think that the trusts of those charities are very imperfectly defined; but we have no knowledge that they are contravened.

48. I think you say that you are not informed with respect to them, and you know nothing about them?—No, very little indeed.

49. There has been no application to the Court of Chancery on the part of any Roman Catholic charities of late years, has there?—In 1851 or 1852 there was a very material application to the Court of Chancery; there was a material litigation in the case of West v. Shuttleworth.

50. Since then there has been no judgment or decision given in any case that has declared or decided the law upon the matter?—No, I do not know that there has been any new material question decided.

51. Mr. Jessel.] There has been the case of Heath v. Chapman since?—Yes.

52. Chairman.] But it is not within your knowledge that there is any particular reason why Roman Catholics do not declare their trusts as openly as other persuasions, or do not take the benefit of the provision that is made under the law for all charities at present?—I know no present reason for any general concealment of their endowments.

53. Do you consider that the decision which you have referred to, of Lord Cottenham in West v. Shuttleworth, would deter any trustees of Roman Catholic charities from disclosing the purpose for which they were given?—It would deter any trustees of charities subject to trusts similar to those which were in question in the case of West v. Shuttleworth, from disclosing them. The material point, if I recollect rightly, which was decided in West v. Shuttleworth was, that notwithstanding that Roman Catholic charities were placed, by the Act of Parliament passed shortly before, on the same footing with charities for the benefit of Dissenting Protestant congregations, yet some of the observances of the Roman Catholic religion were still to be held superstitious and void, and those trusts pervade very numerous Roman Catholic charities.

54. Are they driven to that by the state of the law; are they obliged either to evade the law, or not, to disclose the trust?—Yes, in 1860 there was an attempt to remove this difficulty, and the provision which was made then was, that the trusts which the law would consider superstitious might be separated from the other trusts, and that the endowments being apportioned, the part dedicated by the founder to superstitious use, might be devoted to other charitable purposes.

55. Is that provided for in that Act?—Yes, that is provided for, but still the application of the Act would disturb many Roman Catholic trusts.

56. There was a Report made in 1852, I think, by a Committee of this House, which inquired into the state of the law affecting charitable bequests, and it was recommended that a donation or bequest should not be made void on account of the purpose for which it was applied, so far as that was regarded as superstitious; but that has not been provided for by law, and the law still exists, does it not, that if a bequest is made for a superstitious use, such as prayers for the dead, it renders that bequest void?—That was the decision in the Court of Chancery, but there has been a decision of the Ecclesiastical Court, made by Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, that saying prayers for the dead is not superstitious. He considered the practice to be not necessarily connected with the doctrine of purgatory, and to be a legal object, and that was decided after West v. Shuttleworth.

57. May I ask whether the Charity Commissioners take notice of the purpose of a bequest?—Yes, certainly.

58. What notice would you take, supposing a Catholic charity came under your attention, and it seemed to be for what has been decided in the courts to be superstitious?—Our duty would be to require that the charity should be apportioned, and the part dedicated to the superstitious use separated from the other, and applied to some new Roman Catholic purpose.

59. If it was exclusively for superstitious use, such as only to pray for the dead, you would have no jurisdiction?—No; we should have no jurisdiction if it were exclusively for that purpose.

60. You would consider it void, would you?—It appears to myself a very difficult question; but I have referred to the legal decisions.

61. Are there any special laws affecting monastic and conventual institutions, that you are cognisant of, other than those you have mentioned?—No; I do not know of any general application. At the end of the Act of the 10th of Geo. 4, the principal Catholic Relief Act, there are some clauses which still apply to the members of monastic orders in communion with Rome. Their continuance in the country is declared to be illegal, and a monastery for the habitation of persons belonging to those orders would be illegal.

62. If any charity was given for that purpose, you would notice it as being illegal, and would not act?—We should not act; we meet with most numerous gifts for maintaining tombstones and graves, which are now decided to be no objects of legal charitable gift, and we do not deal with them.

63. You have jurisdiction over all charities left for the maintenance or advancement of the Established Church, have you not?—Yes; supposing they are not vested corporately in the incumbents.

64. But would a bequest to the clergyman or the minister of a particular parish, being for the support of the minister, be a charity?—If given through trustees it would be a charity.

65. And you would then take account of it, would you?—We should do so if necessary; but there are a great many charities in a technical sense only, with which it is not expedient that we should interfere except for the convenience of the parties.

66. Have you any suggestion to make for the amendment of the law, so far as it affects trusts for monastic and conventual institutions?—I know so little about them that I cannot do so. I am not sure whether they are charities.

67. Mr. Jessel.] Assuming that conventual institutions are not illegal, that is to say, institutions for the reception of females, on what ground would you say that they were charities?—It is rather difficult to answer. An association of religious persons together to provide themselves with a building in which to seclude themselves from the world, has nothing charitable about it. Then, supposing that the building is given to them, I do not think myself that that would convert it into a charitable institution. I ventured to suggest the question, comparing them in my mind for this purpose to very different institutions, having no religious character, such as associations for general purposes, which may have a similar permanence, and may alike have buildings or possessions for their convenience, but have no charitable object, or public object.

68. Assuming, of course, that there is no corporation, but simply persons associated, what is the distinction, in your opinion, between a convent and a club, in a legal point of view?—Such an institution as a club was passing in my mind. If the religious persons provide their own residence, and their own means of subsistence, of course there is no distinction at all. But the difficulty arises as you go further. If the building is given to them permanently for affording to them any necessary aid and protection, it may become charitable.

69. On what ground could they become charitable by reason of a gift; supposing a man gave a club-house to a London club, it would not make it a charity?—Not at all, I should think.

70. Then why should a gift to a convent make the convent a charity?—It would be only on some other eleemosynary ground, as for affording some protection or benefit.

71. Then if there was no eleemosynary ground as regards the persons who received it, if they were not poor persons, or persons receiving maintenance, you see no reason why they should be a charity?—It is possible that they may have other than pecuniary necessities provided for them, but I am not prepared to give a definite opinion on this question without knowing the whole circumstances.

72. Mr. Newdegate.] I think you must be aware that there is a wide distinction between your position as Commissioner under the Act of 1853 and the Act of 1860; the Act of 1853 relates to charity property of all denominations, except Roman Catholic; is it not the case that under the Act of 1853 you have become official trustee of any charity that you deal with, or you have become virtually an official trustee?—No; the property of particular charities may be vested in officers officers of our Department as official trustees, but we have not that character.

73. I do not mean that, but I mean that your power of action and position is that of an official trustee, is it not?—I am not aware whether you mean to the extent of administering property.

74. Yes; you are commissioned as a public trustee, are you not?—No; we have no power to administer or to apply any property whatever of charities; we have only a control over other administrators.

75. Your position is, that you are superior to the other trustees, who have to consult you as to the future administration of the charity?—They may apply to us, if they think proper; they may propose to us any question which they find necessary for their guidance in the administration of their trust, and we afford them indemnity by our advice.

76. That is to say, you are to a certain extent created official trustee in every case with which you deal?—I must understand the language of these quesitons in some different sense from that which the honourable Member uses it. I understand that the trustee of a charity is the person who administers the charity, who has the custody of its endowment, and who applies its income. We have not the custody of its endowment, or any share in the administration of its income.

77. But you have the power to ascertain all the purposes, and to direct the application of the property?—We have this power; we have the power of questioning the trustees, and ascertaining the mode in which the charity is applied; and if we point out to them that their application of that charity is not warranted by law, or by their trust, and it is not corrected, we have the power then of certifying their conduct, in order to its being brought before the Court of Chancery; we have not even the power of rectifying it ourselves.

78. But through the Court of Chancery you rectify it?—We can certify the case to the Attorney General; that would be our course of proceeding. If we find a breach of trust proceeding, we can certify to the Attorney General that there is an irregularity in the administration of such a charity, and that, if he thinks fit, he should apply to the Court of Chancery to have it rectified; that is our course of proceeding.

79. And any trustee of any of those charities may do the like, may he not?—Yes; he may apply to the Attorney General, but the Attorney General, I think, would not act upon his application.

80. But he would act upon yours?—Yes, he would probably act upon ours.

81. Under the Act of 1860 you have had but very few enrolments; I think you stated about 400?—I think that was about the number; they are made in the Court of Chancery, not in our office.

82. But you are parties to that enrolment, are you not?—Not in the least; we have no concern with the enrolment at all.

83. In one of your Reports, that of 1862, you enumerate, do you not, a certain number of cases of Roman Catholic trust properties which have been dealt with by enrolment?—I do not recollect it.

84. I only refer to the fact that in your Report, I think it is of 1862, you advert to the operation of the Act of 1860?—It is very likely we stated the number of enrolments, but that is merely what I have stated just now; we could not have stated more.

85. Are you cognisant of the provisions of the Act of 1860?—Yes.

86. It is an enabling Act, is it not?—It is an enabling Act, so far as relates to exceptional enrolments, and it gives power to the Court of Chancery, and to our board, to apportion some Roman Catholic endowments, and it affords a new source of evidence of Catholic trusts; I think those are the material things.

87. Those are the purposes of the Act?—Those are the material provisions of the Act.

88. And under that Act, supposing there were any Roman Catholic trustees for a property, part of which had been devoted to purposes inconsistent with what is called the Superstitious Uses Act and the Mortmain Act, they might come to you and apply for your assistance to purge the trust of any illegality, and to apply the property to Roman Catholic uses not inconsistent with those Statutes?—Yes; that is the first provision of the Act, I think, so far as relates to trusts for superstitious purposes.

89. Very little use has been made by Roman Catholic trustees of that Act, as I understand?—I do not think any use, because no application has been made to us, and any application made to the Court of Chancery would require to be sanctioned by us, and we have not been applied to for that sanction.

90. So that you have had no property that you know to be belonging to convents brought within your cognisance?—I may say almost none. There was a case of a convent at St. Leonards brought before us for some minor purpose for obtaining some power of alienating property, which the managers had otherwise had no legal power of doing, and we use such opportunities of ascertaining the endowments and their application.

91. But your powers with respect to charitable property of other denominations, under the Act of 1853, are greater than under the Act of 1860, are they not?—No, the particular Act of 1860, which has been the subject of the preceding questions, withdrew the exemption of Roman Catholic charities from the provisions of 1853.

92. But it prescribes, does it not, provisions which are not applicable to other charities?—Yes.

93. And those are enabling provisions, not compulsory?—They are not compulsory; Roman Catholics are not bound to use them.

94. When you said that you doubted whether a convent was a charity as regards its property, are you aware of the conditions upon which conventual property is held?—No, we have no means of knowing.

95. Then it was only a speculative opinion?—I only suggested the question as one of difficulty.

96. Supposing a convent to be an association of persons living together, but that to them has been devised or given property, would not that be either a charity in the sense of the word used in appointing your commission on a corporation?

Mr. P. Erle. 24 May 1870.

tion?—It would be a charity, supposing the association of those persons to be for a charitable object.

97. Otherwise it would be in the nature of a corporation, would it not?—No, they are not incorporated; and a gift to a monastery by that name could not have that effect. A gift to it would be made through trustees.

98. But if given to trustees, would not it come within the definition of a charity?—That depends on the objects of the association. It is the question which we had before.

99. You have not information enough to decide that point?—It is a question that depends upon facts. If any condition of facts be given, and our opinion upon it were required, we might answer that; but we do not know the condition.

100. Supposing there is a school, and property is left to that school, although the trust may have other objects than the school, still the property being left for a school constitutes it a charity property, does it not?—Certainly, to that extent. Probably very many conventual trusts have trusts for education annexed to them.

101. Mr. Talbot.] Can you tell me what you understand by a charitable purpose?—There is a very long enumeration of charitable objects in a statute of Elizabeth.

102. Could you give a short summary of those objects, or is that impossible?—The objects may be very various; for the benefit of individuals, or of communities, or of the public.

103. I think just now you stated in answer to an honourable Member, that a property merely left for the purpose of persons living together for a religious life, as it is called, would not be a charitable purpose?—I think it is very doubtful.

104. Having made that negative proposition, I thought perhaps you could give us the affirmative, and say what was a charitable purpose?—It would involve the whole question in debate, and requires more precision than I am prepared to use.

105. Mr. Pemberton.] You do not think that an institution entirely for the support of a certain class of men, say priests, either of the Church of England or Roman Catholic priests, would be a charitable purpose?—The maintenance of a priest or clergyman would not be for his personal benefit, it would be for the benefit of his congregation, and would then be charitable.

106. Then, I understand you to think that an institution for the support of priests, either of the Church of England, or of the Church of Rome, would be a charitable institution?—Yes, within the principle of the last answer.

107. And it would be within your jurisdiction as Charity Commissioners?—Yes, certainly it would, if it is not for the personal benefit, but for the benefit of the priest of a given district or institution.

108. To procure his administrations for a particular district?—Yes, certainly that would be a charity.

109. I think I understand you to say that since 1860 there is no difference, so far as the Charity Commissioners are concerned, between Roman Catholic and Protestant charities?—No, none, except that the Roman Catholics may avail themselves of some special powers which were given to them by the Act of 1860.

110. They have the same power, have they not, as Protestant charities have?—They have more, they may give some more ready proof by usage of the existence of their charities.

111. But you do not, of course, inquire into any particular institution unless you are in some way set in motion by private information?—Not generally, unless there is some information or other showing occasion for inquiry.

112. Probably the reason why you have a greater number of cases of Protestant charities than of Roman Catholic charities, is because you are deficient of any information regarding them?—Yes, they are not brought before us for any purpose. We have never, I think, received any complaints respecting the administration of Catholic charities.

113. I think you mentioned the case of an institution at St. Leonards, and you said that they came to you to carry out some purpose with respect to the management of their property, and you took that opportunity of inquiring into the trusts?—Yes.

114. Was that inquiry carried out?—Yes, we have a copy of their deed of endowment.

115. And was the original object for which they came to you carried out?—Yes, as far as we know; no sort of doubt was suggested upon that point; they sent to us, without the least hesitation, their deed of endowment.

116. Mr. Pease.] You stated, did you not, that five out of the 400 Roman Catholic charities which had been enrolled were full of information, and that the other 395, or thereabout, were short?—I did not mean to confine myself to a precise number; I meant that a very large proportion of the enrolments were very insufficient for affording information.

117. Were those five, to the best of your recollection, old charities or modern ones?—They must have been old charities, because they would not otherwise have been enrolled under that Act.

118. Can you tell the Committee the general scope of those charities; were they for educational purposes, or what?—No, I am not prepared to say; I would have had the information if I had anticipated my being asked the question.

119. Mr. Pemberton.] Could you produce them if it were necessary?—They may be obtained at the Enrolment Office.

120. Mr. Pease.] Of those that have been produced with the full particulars, have the accounts been furnished from year to year to your satisfaction?—No, they have not. When I said that they were full, I meant to say that they were exceptional from the others, which give no information at all.

121. Mr. Bourke.] How many inspectors have you got?—We have four inspectors.

122. And is part of the duty of those inspectors to find out the different charities that you do not know of before?—They act under the orders of our board. We send them into districts as we find necessary, and then they have instructions to inquire into all charities in the locality.

123. Do they ever report to you the existence of certain charities that you had not known of before?—Yes; a great number.

124. Supposing you have been called upon to apportion apportion a gift under the Act of 1860, has it ever occurred to you as to what principle you would apply at all to that apportionment?—That would depend very much upon the particular locality, and the principal purpose of the charity itself.

125. Would you endeavour to apportion it in such a way as you would think would be most consistent with the original intentions of the founder?—If the apparent purposes of the founder appeared to us equally beneficial with others, we should prefer them on that account, but we should take the condition of the locality at the time into account.

126. You have spoken about the decision in West v. Shuttleworth; that decision, I believe, was only declaratory of the common law?—I do not understand fully the principle of that decision.

127. Are you acquainted with the Act 1 Geo. 4, c. 50?—I do not know the object of the Act you mention.

128. That was an Act which made all Catholic property given for superstitious uses vest in the Crown; have you ever turned your attention to that Act at all?—Not for any practical purpose.

129. You do not know whether that was in fact the Act which prevented Roman Catholic charities from being enrolled and registered?—No, I do not know that.

130. With reference to the five trusts that you have mentioned, have you applied for the accounts of those trusts?—No, we have not; we do not know who are now the trustees; I am afraid that I was misapprehended if I am supposed to have spoken with more precision than I intended to use respecting those charities; I merely meant to say that out of a very great number there were a very small number indeed which professed to give their trusts at all; and where the trusts were stated in some detail, no means were afforded of ascertaining at all who are the trustees at the present day. They would state only the trustees at the time of the grants, probably at a remote period; but they would not continue any information to the present time.

131. Mr. Gregory.] I think your duties extend not only to the inquiry as to what property belongs to a charity, but as to the application of it?—That is the case.

132. That is within the scope of your ordinary inquiry, is it not?—Quite so.

133. You have the power, I think, of framing schemes for the proper application of funds?—We have the power, under certain limitations.

134. I am taking it generally, that you have power within certain conditions of framing schemes for the application of the funds?—Yes.

135. Then of course your inquiries would lead you actually to the inspection of the institutions, would it not?—If it were necessary we should do so through our inspectors.

136. For instance, taking such a charity as Christ's Hospital, you have made inquiries into that, have you not?—Yes.

137. You would make inquiries into their property, and the nature and extent of it I presume, would you not?—That would depend upon the object of our inquiry.

138. Taking the inquiry that you had to institute, was not that the effect of it?—Yes.

139. And you inquired into the application of the property, I think?—Yes.

140. And the number of objects, and how they were provided for?—That was so.

141. So that any large charity would fall within the scope of your duties, would it not?—Yes, certainly, for many purposes; but we could not with effect attempt to re-model the management or objects of such a charity as Christ's Hospital.

142. Supposing a third party gave you information to the effect that they believed that the objects of the charity were not fully or fairly carried out, you would then prosecute your inquiry in that respect, would you not?—Yes, certainly.

143. You have been asked to distinguish those conventual institutions from clubs, and I think you had some little difficulty in doing so, but if there was anything like an educational endowment attached to them, that would bring them within the term of a charity, would it not?—I think so.

144. Again, for the relief of the sick, nursing establishments for instance, those would come under that category?—Yes, those would be eleemosynary objects.

145. How would you deal with benefit clubs; do you consider them merely as clubs, or as charitable institutions?—They are supported by their own subscriptions only.

146. But they may have endowments attached to them, may they not?—If they have endowments, they would be within our jurisdiction to the extent only of the endowment.

147. But still that would bring them within your jurisdiction pro tanto?—Yes, pro tanto, only we should have no right to inquire about their subscriptions.

148. With respect to those enrolments since 1860, you say that they gave you no information as to the trusts on which the property was held?—Very few.

149. In fact I suppose they were merely registers of the legal estate?—They were registers of the actual deeds of grant; not of the transmisson of the estate, but merely the original grant.

150. And you did not follow it any further?—We had no means of following it further.

151. You mentioned a decision of Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, to the effect that prayers for the dead are not now superstitious; was that case carried to the Privy Council?—No, I think not.

152. Then it is merely resting upon the authority of Sir Herbert Jenner Fust?—Yes, it is reported in Curtis's Reports.

153. Could you give us the name of the case?—It is in 1st Curtis, and it relates to Carisbrooke Churchyard.

154. Mr. Howes.] The case of West v. Shuttleworth was subsequent, was it not, to the decision of Sir Herbert Jenner Fust?—I think not. I think Sir Herbert Jenner Fust's decision was a very short time subsequent to West v. Shuttleworth.

155. You have said, I think, that an association of priests, whether Roman Catholic or Anglican, with an endowment, would be a charitable purpose?—I should doubt that very much, if it is merely for the maintenance of those priests.

156. Not merely for maintenance, but for the purpose of enabling them to perform their religious duties?—No, I doubt that very much, if the case is meant of a number of persons associating merely for performing together their personal religious duties.

157. Supposing even that you had said so, you would not extend that to an association of women for the purpose simply of enabling them to lead a religious life?—I think it is the same question.

158. But if the latter association were for any further purpose, such as enabling them to teach poor children or to visit hospitals, and to act as sisters of mercy, and so forth, then, probably, it would be a charitable purpose?—Yes, I think so.

159. How would it be, supposing the object or purpose of such establishment was to carry on those works of benevolence?—It would be a charitable institution.

160. How would it be, supposing it was an express or implied object of any one of those institutions of women, for instance, that they were bound expressly, or by implication, to pray for the soul of the founder; would that be a charitable purpose, so as to make it a superstitious use, and therefore, to a great extent, render it apportionable, if not void?—It would make it apportionble under the Act of 1860.

161. That would be rather following the decision in West v. Shuttleworth, would it not?—It would be following the decision in West v. Shuttleworth to the extent that such a trust would be void in itself; then it would come within the Act of 1860, and make the endowment apportionable.

162. Have you any principles or regulations upon which, or according to which, you make the apportionment, where the deed of endowment itself makes no apportionment. I speak of specific endowments, where you are enabled, under the Statute of 1860, to make an apportionment between valid uses and superstitious uses?—We have never been called upon to act in such cases. As I stated just now, we should judge of the expediency of the different proposals that might be made to us; we should not surrender our judgment to any of the parties; we should endeavour to make it useful to the fullest extent of the means.

163. In answer to my question you stated that at present you have laid down no principles, and have found no regulations by which you would consider yourselves bound?—No; we have had no opportunity of action, and it would be inexpedient to make general regulations on such a subject.

164. Mr. O'Reilly.] You have had some questions put to you by the honourable Member for North Warwickshire, and I am not quite clear as to your answers; you were asked whether, in cases of charities, you were not virtually the official trustee of the charity, and whether the other trustees must consult you as to the administration of the charity; I would like to have a distinct answer to that question; must the other trustees consult you as to the administration of the charity?—I endeavoured, in answering the honourable Member, to disclaim our being trustees in any sense, for we really are not; we have no power, as I said, of performing one function of trustees; we cannot apply any portion of any endowment ourselves, and therefore all that we can do is to control those who do administer.

165. Would I not be right in saying then that the other trustees need not consult you as to the administration of the trust; although you would have the power of seeing that they had administered it rightly, they need not consult your board as to the administration?—No; it would be quite impossible for all the trustees of every endowed charity in the kingdom to be applying to us with respect to their ordinary functions.

166. Another statement in one of his questions was that you had power to direct the application of a charity; speaking of all charities, is it correct that you can direct the application of a charity, or is not your power merely confined to seeing that it is applied in the way directed by the trust?—We have no power of summarily directing the application; it could only take place in this way, that if the application of the charity requires amendment, any parties interested may apply to us to establish a scheme of regulations, and when we have gone through the formalities by which that scheme must be preceded and established, then that scheme is binding on the trustees; we have no more summary mode of directing the application than that.

167. Then it would be correct to say that you may sanction the scheme proposed for the application of the trust, but not correct to say that you yourselves have the power of directing the application?—No, we have no summary power of interfering at all, but with prescribed formalities we may establish new schemes.

168. Another question put to you was this, that an association of persons living together, if property be given to them, was either a charity or a corporation; I think you dissented from that proposition, did you not?—Certainly, a gift may not be charitable, and cannot create a corporation.

169. The next question put to you was, would it not be a corporation not incorporated; do you know of any such thing?—No, there are certain corporations for limited purposes, but not in the sense in which the question, I think, was asked.

170. The next question was whether, in such a case of an association of persons living together with anything else added to it, if property be given to trustees for them, it would come under the definition of a charity; do you accept that statement?—It is again the same question, depending on the special purposes of the gift, whether those are charities or not.

171. Then it would not come under the definition of a charity, simply because it was given to an association of persons living together, would it?—No, I think not. A trust for the inhabitants of a specific building would not, I think, constitute any charity of itself without reference to the purposes of their association.

172. With regard to the institutions, and the law with respect to which we may direct our inquiries, that is to say, conventual and monastic institutions, some hypothetical cases have been put to you; allow me to put this case to you; if an an endowment were left for the support of an association of ladies of the Roman Catholic Church, who agree to live together, and devote themselves to exercises of personal piety, but not any corporal charity as regards others, would that be a charitable endowment, in your veiw?—I am afraid it is the same question to which I can give no more positive answer; I think it would not be a charity.

173. You mentioned that there had been one or two small complaints of the administration of Roman Catholic charities, which were brought to your notice; can you remember whether those were trusts connected with monastic or conventual institutions?—Not at all; we have never had any complaint on the subject of any conventual or monastic institution.

174. Can you of your own knowledge give us any information as to charitable trusts connected with the subject of our reference, namely, monastic and conventual institutions?—No; I am not in possession of any specific information respecting such institutions.

175. You have referred to the statute as to superstitious uses: supposing the case which was put by an honourable Member, of an endowment left for the support of religious ladies, who taught a school, but that a condition of the endowment was, that they should pray for the soul of the benefactor, would that in your view vitiate the whole of the endowment, or, if not, how could you separate it?—I think that the condition being only for offering these prayers would render the gift wholly void, according to the existing law.

176. Could you tell the Committee, as nearly as you can, your view of the English law at present as to superstitious uses?—I have only seen specified the maintaining of lamps, and the praying for the dead, or the keeping of obits. I do not know of any others that have come into recent question.

177. Do those questions as to superstitious uses apply exclusively to Roman Catholic institutions, in the terms of the law?—No question has been raised with reference to any other trusts of that nature.

178. As far as you know, would an endowment for the support of a Mormon temple and Mormon teaching, in any way come under the law against superstitious uses?—It would probably be considered against the policy of the law, and void for that reason.

179. Or take the case of a Mahommedan temple or teaching?—I suppose that again would be invalid as against the policy of the law. A trust for maintaining the Jewish religion was considered by the courts to be void; but the Jews have been relieved from that by specific enactment. Other trusts opposed to the Christian religion, and not within the remedial laws referred to, would be invalid.

180. Would they be void by law in England or in the English dominions generally?—I cannot answer with respect to more than the English law.

181. You are probably aware that there are many such endowments in India, and that they are not void by law?—Yes, I should think not; I am speaking solely of English law.

182. Mr. Sherlock.] Reference has been made to the case of West v. Shuttleworth; do you recollect exactly the decision in that case?—Yes, I think so.

183. Was it not that money given for the maintenance of a priest was held to be void by Lord Cottenham under the Statute of Superstitious Uses?—No; I think in West v. Shuttleworth it was only that property given for maintaining prayers for the dead was held to be given on void trusts, and it went to the next of kin.

184. Mr. Matthews.] The words of the legacy in West v. Shuttleworth as you will find them in the 2nd Milne & Keen are: "It is my wish and desire the sums may be paid as soon as possible, that I may have the benefit of their prayers and masses?"—Yes; it was given in those terms. There was a former case of a grant to a Roman Catholic priest simply.

185. Mr. Sherlock.] And that was held to be void?—Yes; it was held to be void, before the Act of the 2 & 3 Will. 4.

186. You spoke of the enrolment of those deeds; the act of enrolment is the transcribing of the deed, is it not, upon the roll?—Yes; it must set out the whole of the settlement to charitable uses.

187. Is it not the actual transcribing of the deed itself?—Yes.

188. The enrolment, then, cannot contain anything that the deed itself does not contain?—No.

189. Have you any reason to suppose that in the cases to which you refer, the precise words of the deeds were not accurately set out in the enrolment?—Not the least; I think the deeds were simply transcribed.

190. Then it was not the enrolment that was imperfect?—No, the deeds were enrolled, but the settlement to charitable uses was imperfect.

191. Then they may be insufficient to convey any information, but the enrolment itself was as perfect as the deed would permit it to be?—Quite so.

192. You have referred to the Statute of Elizabeth; that is the foundation, is it not, of the English law with reference to what is a charity?—It is constantly referred to as containing a catalogue of the principal objects, but that enumeration is not complete.

193. Does that Act, in your opinion, refer to or include in any way monastic or conventual institutions; were they contemplated as coming within the purview of that Act of Parliament according to your view?—I suppose certainly not from the date of the Act; it was at the end of Queen Elizabeth's reign, and they could not be contemplated at that time as charities.

194. Are you aware of any other Act of Parliament since, dealing with charitable institutions, and defining charities, that does contemplate monastic and conventual institutions?—None that specially relates to them; at least, I do not know any.

195. Mr. Newdegate.] You are aware, are you not, that there is in the Act of 1860 a clause specifically reciting and re-enacting the clauses of the Roman Catholic Relief Act of 1829?—It has no reference in terms to monastic institutions.

196. Mr. Matthews.] With reference to what you were asked by the honourable Member for North Warwickshire, is it not the fact that Roman Catholic charities are now completely subject to the provisions of the Act of 1853?—Yes, quite so.

197. The exemption which they enjoyed in the interval between 1853 and 1860 has entirely ceased?—That is so.

198. Do your powers of inspection and control, such as they are, apply to Roman Catholic charities as fully and as amply as to Protestant charities?—In the same degree.

199. There is no difference whatever in the jurisdiction that you have over Roman Catholic charities and in the jurisdiction which you have over Protestant charities?—No, none, that I am aware of.

200. You have said that the trustees of Protestant charities are not the persons who habitually apply to you for assistance or inspection?—They very frequently do, but there are many other applicants.

201. I understood that generally the applications came from those who were dissatisfied in the administration of the trusts?—No, that is too general; we have a great number of applications by trustees who are most interested in the charities, and most interested in their advancement, and in extending their benefits.

202. I presume trustees do not come to you, to say that they have been guilty of mal-administration?—No; but they say the trusts confine their hands so much, that they could make the charities much more useful if we would set them free.

203. And they come to you for a new scheme?—Yes.

204. On the other hand, have you applications from persons interested in the benefits of the charity, who say that the trusts have not been duly administered?—Yes; we have many such applications also.

205. With respect to convents and monasteries, you have not had an application of either sort?—None whatever.

206. You have expressed your opinion that a trust for the maintenance of a monastery, would be illegal under the clauses of the Emancipation Act?—Yes; so far as relates to monks of particular orders whose residence in this county is prohibited.

207. I think all other orders; it is a section, is it not, of the Emancipation Act; we will take it generally with respect to any monk coming within the prohibitory clauses of the Emancipation Act; a trust for their maintenance, you have expressed the opinion, would be an illegal trust?—I think so.

208. Have you directed your attention to those statutory enactments which make it at least doubtful whether a convent of women is not also an illegal institution?—They are excepted from those clauses of the Catholic Relief Act.

209. You are acquainted, are you not, with the 31 Geo. 3, c. 52, I think, which expressly excepts convents as well as monasteries from the benefit of the Catholic relief then given?—I am not acquainted with that Act.

210. Perhaps you have not had your attention recently drawn to the statute of the 23 Hen. 8, c. 10, which enacts that, "Where by reason of feoffments, fines, recoveries, and other estates and assurances made of trust of manors, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, to the use of parish churches, chapels, churchwardens, guilds, fraternities, commonalties, companies, or brotherhoods, erected and made of devotion or by common assent of the people without any corporation, and also by reason of feoffments, fines, recoveries, wills, and other acts made to any uses aforesaid, or to the uses and intents to have obites perpetual," and so on, is prejudicial and prohibiting such things; has your attention been directed to that statute?—It has not.

211. There is no express relief; no repeal of the section?—I am not prepared to answer that.

212. You would not be prepared to give an opinion that a convent impliciter is a legal institution in favour of which a legal trust might be well declared?—I see no reason myself why it should not.

213. As to the enrolment under the Statute of 1860, the effect of the Statute of 1860 was simply, was it not, as far as the enrolment was concerned, to cure the defective enrolment under the previous Mortmain Act of Geo. 2?—That was the effect of the clause.

214. To enable the people who had omitted to enrol under the Act of Geo. 2, to come in in the course of 12 months and enrol under the Act of 1860?—They only acquired the benefit of the Act Geo. 2 on those terms.

215. Therefore that benefit only applied to trusts then existing?—Certainly.

216. I mean that the Act of 1860 has given no advantage or benefit in the way of emolument to any Catholic charity created since 1860?—None. It provides for the support of Roman Catholic Charities by evidence of usage only.

217. But as to the enrolment of Roman Catholic charities, the Act of 1860 gives no facility to any Roman Catholic charity thereafter created?—No, certainly not.

218. As to Roman Catholic charities then existing, I have understood you to say that the deeds were naturally silent about the trusts, because the law struck at those trusts, and made them illegal?—Yes.

219. Is not that the reason why those 400 deeds, which have been enrolled, give you no information as to the trusts, and that systematically Catholic charitable trust deeds were by the operation of the law necessarily silent as to the trusts?—Yes, I think so; the founders could not venture to declare the trusts.

220. I will take the usage clause; the 5th clause of the Roman Catholic Charity Act of 1860, makes consistent usage of the last preceding 20 years conclusive evidence of the trusts upon which the same property shall have been settled?—Yes, that is so.

221. Does it not follow from that, that if for 20 years before the Act, property left in trust for any Catholic charity had been applied to the maintenance, for instance, of a priest who said masses for the repose of the soul of the donor, by the operation of that 5th clause that usage becomes conclusive evidence of the trusts which were themselves selves illegal under the law of superstitious uses?—No, I should think not, because it is required that the endowment shall have been consistently applied to some charitable use during the last 20 years. This would not apply to a superstitious use.

222. The maintenance of a priest, who had constantly for 20 years said masses for the soul of the donor, would be conclusive evidence that that was the object of the trust upon which the property had been settled?—No; I think that the usage might establish a trust for the maintenance of the priest, but not for doing an illegal thing. According to the decision of the Court, the saying of masses for the dead is not a charitable purpose, and therefore it was not to be proved a consistent usage.

223. How could you suppose that a case of that sort would be dealt with, supposing you had found that it had been a consistent usage for 20 years?—It might be dealt with as a trust for the maintenance of the priest for the district.

224. Displacing the usage?—Only displacing that which was not charitable, and supporting the trust for maintaining the priest as a charitable and legal purpose.

225. Mr. Newdegate.] Is it not the fact that the law against superstitious uses, that is, against prayers for the dead, has a general application, and is not limited to Roman Catholics?—Yes; though according to the judgment of Sir Herbert Jenner Fust it is not illegal to say prayers for the dead.

226. Chairman.] Supposing we had another sect or persuasion in the country that left money to pray for the repose of souls, to pray for the dead, it would be just as illegal as applicable to them as it would be to Roman Catholics?—Yes, quite so.

227. Mr. Matthews.] Is it the case that Sir Herbert Jenner Fust decided that it was legal in the Church of England to pray for the dead?—Yes; I understand that to be his decision generally.

228. Whereas bequests for a priest to say masses for the dead have been uniformly held to be illegal?—The case to which I referred was this: there was a tombstone erected in the churchyard with the inscription "Pray for the soul" of the person whom it was desired to commemorate, and it was justified on the ground that "it is a wholesome and good thing to pray for the dead." There were law proceedings taken in the Ecclesiastical Court against the person who placed that monument, and upon those proceedings Sir Herbert Jenner Fust held that praying for the dead did not involve the doctrine of purgatory; that the habit of praying for the dead was prior to the doctrine of purgatory; and that there was nothing illegal that he knew of in the law of England in praying for the dead.

229. On the other hand, it seems that for a Roman Catholic priest to say masses or prayers for the dead was uniformly held to be bad, and a trust for that purpose to be void?—Yes; it was so held in Chancery, but I do not know whether the tombstone commemorated a Roman Catholic or Protestant

230. Mr. Newdegate.] Would it be held to be legal in the case of a minister of another denomination?—I do not know that the question has arisen, but I suppose there would be no difference.

231. Mr. Talbot.] Is there not a distinction between saying masses for the souls of the dead, and merely praying for the dead; one being superstition, and the other the law having said nothing about?—I do not know of any distinction that is so expressed.

232. Mr. Cogan.] Where any charity is maintained partly by voluntary subscriptions and partly by means arising from endowment, under the Act of 1853, does not your power extend simply to the endowment; it does not extend at all to the voluntary subscriptions?—It does not; it is entirely confined to the endowment.

233. In the case of donations or bequests in trust for any such charity, of which no special application or appropriation shall be directed or declared by the donor or testator, and which may legally be applied by the governing or managing body of such charity as income in aid of the voluntary subscriptions, that also is not subject to your jurisdiction?—No; you are reading the exemptions, I think, in the Act of 1853.

234. An endowment of that sort, with no special direction as to its application, and which may go in aid of the income from voluntary subscriptions, is exempt, is it not, from your jurisdiction?—We consider that all charitable gifts, the capital of which may be expended at once, are beyond our jurisdiction.

235. The Statute of 1860, with regard to Catholic charities, does not abolish the old Statutes against superstitious uses; it simply modifies the operation of the law previously, which made void the entire of any bequest part of which was for a superstitious use; is not that so?—Yes, that is quite so.

236. The Statute of 1860 simply enabled the superstitious or bad use to be separated from the good use, and the part which was for good use to be appropriated as intended by the testator or donor, and that which was applied to what was by the law a superstitious use, could be applied by the Charity Commissioners to cy-prés use; is not that so?—Yes; it is in larger terms, I think, than a cy-prés use.

237. But if part of that bequest was for what the law considers a superstitious use, such as saying masses for the dead, that bequest clearly could not, by the law of 1860, be appropriated for such purpose?—No; it could not.

238. It would still be bad?—Clearly so.

239. The law, as at present, would render it impossible for a Roman Catholic charity legally to be enforced which contained provisions for saying masses for the dead, or which involved donations for the maintenance of monastic orders, which are declared illegal by the Emancipation Act?—Such a charity could not be maintained unless it were cured by the Act of 1860; if it were entirely for illegal purposes, it would be invalid.

240. So far, Roman Catholics are in an exceptional position from other religious communities, are they not?—I think not in that respect. If a charity were established for enabling the members of another religious community to say masses for the dead; the same law would apply to them.

Mr. Henry Morgan Vane, called in; and Examined.

24 May 187c.

241. Chairman.] You are the Secretary to the Charity Commissioners, I believe?—I am.

242. Are you by that office an official trustee of charities?—Of charity lands, and also one of the official trustees of charitable funds.

243. Is it provided in the Act that the secretary should be so?—Yes, it is.

244. What are the particular duties of an official trustee with respect to all charities, whether land or funds?—They are totally distinct.

245. Is it supervision over other trustees?—No. As regards the official trustee of charity lands, he is a bare trustee for holding the legal estate. The Act says that he shall not interfere in any way with the management of the property.

246. What is the purpose of his being official trustee?—Where land is given to persons such as the rector and churchwardens, who are the trustees of the charity ex officio, or to churchwardens ex officio, then it is necessary that the land should be vested in the official trustee of charity lands.

247. Have you no authority at all, and no power over the trust?—No.

248. Does that apply to all charity funds?—The fee is vested by order of the Court of Chancery or by the Charity Commissioners; and by the same tribunals can be divested.

249. Then could the trustees act without the sanction of the official trustee in the administration of a trust?—Yes, in the administration of a trust, but they cannot deal with property except under the circumstances mentioned in the Act of 1860.

250. What circumstances do you refer to?—Those mentioned in Section 16 of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 136. It is an Act of 1860, but not the Act relating to Roman Catholics.

251. Are you, in your capacity as secretary, brought into immediate communication with the inspectors?—Constantly.

252. Are there written instructions to those inspectors directing the course of their inquiry or inspection?—No written instructions, but they have generally instructions, and when they have orders to inspect any particular locality, they act upon those general instructions, unless the order authorises them to inquire into the charity more particularly.

253. Do they act only upon specific instructions with respect to the charities of the localities, or are they bound to ascertain for the information of the board where any charities exist?—No, they never go to a place for the purpose of making an inspection without an order for that purpose.

254. And your board never directs them to inquire unless the trustees themselves, or some persons interested in the charity, have moved the board to do so?—Unless the Commissioners themselves think it necessary to make that inquiry, or complaint has been made to the Commissioners, or a request made to them that there should be an inquiry.

255. But they have no means of getting information except that which originates with the parties themselves?—It may so happen that a charity is reported in the printed reports of the former Commissioners for inquiring into charities, and they may have certain information in addition to that.

256. But the board do not seek information; they have the means of obtaining it, and when it is notified to them by the trust, or by a person interested in the charity, they act, but not otherwise?—The Commissioners would be unable, in many instances to make a scheme for the better administration of a charity without having the aid of a report made by an inquiry upon the spot by one of the inspectors.

257. Has it been a subject of consideration at the board that the Catholic charities are never brought under their notice?—The Commissioners in their Ninth Report, made in 1862, did advert to that very subject. I have got that report with me, if the Committee would like to hear the passage which relates to that subject.

258. Was that report after the Act of 1860?—Yes; after the Act of 1860.

259. What is the nature of the report to which you now refer?—It is the report of the Charity Commissioners in 1862, and it says "The temporary exemption of Roman Catholic charities from the operation of the Charitable Trusts Act ceased in 1860. The Roman Catholic Charities Act of the same year created special facilities for supplying the emolument of existing Roman Catholic endowments, which though necessary to their legal validity (when comprising real estate) had been omitted during the prevalence of laws specially affecting the Roman Catholic body. Although numerous grants have been enrolled, as in compliance with that Act (approaching to 400 in number), yet the trusts on which these assurances were made or which were intended to be attached to the grantees, appear only on a very inconsiderable portion of the enrolments, and it may perhaps be concluded that the administrators of the properties which they comprise, have preferred to rely upon their practical dedication to public purposes, rather than by legalising their settlement to subject them more directly to the general law, or that the means of making more sufficient enrolments may have been wanting. No returns have yet been made of the income and expenditure of any such charities, but the time allowed for the transmission of such returns for the year 1861, the first complete year since the termination of the exemption referred to, has not fully expired."

260. That is the notice which you make in the report, but have you made any observation with respect to the absence of enrolment after the first year?—I am unable to answer that question, but a search is now being made in the Enrolment Office for a note of all the deeds that have been subsequently enrolled.

261. The inquiry not previously being made, it is now being made?—It is now being made, and I dare say by this time it will be complete. The clerk from the Charity Commissioners, who made inquiry yesterday, was informed that it was not then complete.

262. Do you confirm Mr. Erle, that there has been no notice brought before the board of any Roman Catholic charities coming under their consideration since 1862? I think, perhaps, you must have misunderstood Mr. Erle. We have had several Roman Catholic charities brought under the notice of the Charity Commissioners since 1861. They have sent us their deeds, and on receipt of their deeds we have registered them in our book of charities; and they are now amongst the charities of the country registered in our books.

263. You only register after enrolment, I believe?—No; for instance, a charity in money only would not require enrolment; and it is merely registered in our books.

264. Have you proceeded in the case of the Roman Catholic charities as you would in any other case?—Yes, certainly.

265. You assumed the same authority as you have in respect to other charity trusts?—Yes, without distinction.

266. You stated, did you not, that there have been several cases of that kind since 1862?—Yes.

267. There has been no difficulty with respect to the purposes of the trust?—None whatever; nothing has been withheld. We have, as usual, required to see the trusts mentioned in the deed affecting the property with which they have asked the Charity Commissioners to deal, or to assist them in dealing.

268. You could not have acted at all unless you knew the trusts?—Certainly not.

269. There was no reluctance on their part to disclose them?—None whatever.

270. And, as far as you remember, they were innocent in their purport?—Certainly.

271. Supposing there might have been a question about the nature of the charity, and the deed was enrolled, should you have looked to the purpose?—Certainly. The Charity Commission would not undertake it for anyone until they were perfectly satisfied of the legality and propriety of the trusts.

272. The purposes of those trusts are sometimes expressed, are they not, in language that raises questions and doubts although they are not obviously illegal?—Yes, and the Charity Commissioners are perfectly competent to deal with those questions.

273. You are not aware, from any information that you receive from the inspectors, that the Catholics have any particular reason for not submitting to your authority with respect to their trust?—None. I only know one instance in which an inspector, happening to be in a town in Somersetshire, had an application made to him by the Roman Catholic priest of the town for advice upon a matter, and the inspector informs me that it was a question which he was unable to determine, and he said that the remedy which the Roman Catholic priest required must be sought for in the Court of Chancery.

274. You have to do with the accounts of those Catholic charities, have you not?—In some few instances only.

275. Do your inspectors examine on oath?—Yes, they have that power.

276. Have you heard Mr. Erle's evidence?—Yes.

277. Have you anything to suggest to the Committee beyond what he has stated?—There is nothing that I wish to add to his evidence.

278. Mr. Jessel.] Do you recollect any instance, of an application to the Charity Commissioners, on behalf of a convent or monastery?—I only recollect one instance, which savours really of that character. It was one at Hastings in which the trustees applied for the authority of the Charity Commissioners to deal with their property to some advantage, by granting leases beyond the term of 21 years; and that authority was readily granted.

279. Was that the case of a convent?—It is called a female school. It is a training school at St. Leonards, I have the trust deed with me.

280. Mr. Matthews.] It is in point of fact not a convent in the ordinary acceptation of the term?—I am unable to define the exact meaning of the term.

281. Chairman.] Was that a case which came before the Board of Charity Commissioners?—Yes.

282. Mr. Jessel.] And I understand it is a school?—It is a school.

283. Then of course it is a charity of an ordinary character?—I think it is of an ordinary character.

284. Has your attention been called to the law relating to convents?—No, it has not.

285. Have not you considered the question as to whether convents as such are charities or not?—No, I have not.

286. I suppose you would not consider it unless the case were brought before you?—No.

287. Mr. Newdegate.] You stated, did you not, that for all charities you are the official trustee, qua secretary, to the Charity Commissioners?—I am the official trustee of lands belonging to a charity when an order has been made vesting those lands in me.

288. Qua secretary to the Commissioners?—Yes; the Act says the secretary shall be the official trustee of charity lands.

289. Have any lands belonging to Roman Catholic charities been so vested in you?—No; none whatever, that I am aware of. The Court of Chancery might have vested them in me without my knowing it; it would have been the duty of the trustees to inform me to that effect, but I have received no such information.

290. You know the Statute of 1860, do you not?—Yes.

291. Do you believe that any of the subsequent Statutes under which it would be your duty to act, the Statute of 1861, the Statute of 1862, the Statute of 1864, and the Statute of 1866, are applicable to Roman Catholic charities? — It would be hardly right, and probably it would be arrogance in me, to answer that question. I do not know of any case which has been brought before the Charity Commissioners, or brought before me in such a way that I should put it before them, and ask their opinion upon the matter; I should of course be guided by the manner in which they interpreted those Acts.

292. You are not in a position to state whether the trustees of Roman Catholic property have availed themselves of the provision of those Statutes,

Statutes, in applications to the Court of Chancery?—No not to the Court of Chancery.

293. To the Rolls Court?—No not to the Rolls Court; that would be the Court of Chancery; I am not aware that they would be able to go there without having first obtained the certificate and order of the Charity Commissioners for the purpose, or without having made application direct to the Attorney General.

294. Then you are not aware that they have enrolled without application to your commission?—The Enrolment Office is an office entirely under the direction of the Master of the Rolls; and the Charitable Trusts Act says that every official of the Board of Charity Commisioners shall have access to the office, but beyond that I can say nothing; I do not search the Enrolment Office myself.

295. Then the answer to that question could be given by some officer from that office?—Yes, exactly so.

296. You have stated that you sent down inspectors into different localities; do you send down inspectors only when applied to by the trustees, or do you also do so when applied to by other parties?—Frequently the Commissioners before making a scheme, or making an order affecting property, and especially where large sums of money are to be laid out in the rebuilding of a school, would think it necessary that one of their own inspectors should visit the spot, and take evidence upon the question, and should report to them in writing for their guidance only.

297. Then an application would come to them in the first instance?—Not necessarily for inspection.

298. You could send down an inspector without an application?—Yes, certainly.

299. Have you any list of the Roman Catholic trust deeds with which you have dealt?—Yes certainly.

300. Could you furnish that to the Committee?—Yes, they are registered.

301. Could you furnish a copy of the register?—I could not furnish a copy of the book of registers; I could furnish you with an abstract, and produce the book.

Mr. William Henry Gunning Bagshawe, was called in; and Examined.

Mr. Bagshawe.

302. Mr. Matthews.] You are a Counsel, are you not, practising at the Equity Bar?—Yes.

303. And you are a Roman Catholic?—Yes.

304. Have you had considerable experience as a conveyancer, with respect to the property of Roman Catholic institutions, for many years?—Yes.

305. You are no doubt conversant with the present state of the law respecting them?—Yes, I think so.

306. Will you state to the Committee, in your own way, what you consider to be the present state of the law with regard to convents and monasteries?—With respect to monasteries containing monks bound by vows, which is the test furnished by the Emancipation Act, there can be no doubt about their complete illegality, because the Emancipation Act renders the taking or administering of such vows a misdemeanour, and imposes the penalty of banishment or ultimately of transportation. There can be no doubt that such institutions are, in every respect, as completely illegal as any associations formed for any purpose which, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, is illegal, or even immoral. That is the position of all monasteries containing monks bound by vows; and I think I may say practically that that applies to all monasteries, because I think there is no such thing as a monastery, properly so called, that does not contain monks bound by vows; and, in point of fact, it is part of the essential idea of monasticism that there should be vows.

307. It was suggested just now by some honourable Member that there might be monks who did not take vows, but such a thing does not exist in modern times, does it?—I think not; I think that the essential idea of a monk is a person who is bound by the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience.

308. On the other hand, the Emancipation Act, I think, draws a distinction between jesuits and persons belonging to monastic institutions?—I think that Jesuits are merely selected as specimens.

309. In strictness the Jesuits are not a monastic order, I believe?—I believe that, technically speaking, they are a congregation rather than an order.

310. In like manner other gentlemen, of whom we certainly hear a good deal in Parliament, the Oratorians, are also not a monastic institution?—But in a very different sense from the Jesuits; the Jesuits take vows, and I have no doubt that even if they had not been named they would have been within the terms of the Emancipation Act. With respect to the Oratorians, they are, in very many respects, quite different; they possess their own property, and take no vows, and they are free to leave whenever they please. With respect to the monks, I have only further to add this, which, although a small point, may be worth mentioning, that there is a special provision against their using their habits out of church or private houses; that is to say, in addition to the enactment which I have mentioned, there is a special enactment in section 26 rendering it illegal for them to wear their habit, for example, at a funeral in a Roman Catholic churchyard. I do not think I have anything to add with respect to monasteries.

311. Will you just follow out that for a moment. Does it follow from that enactment of the Emancipation Act that any trust for the maintenance and benefit of monks is an illegal trust?—Simply illegal, I have no doubt.

312. It is open, is it not, to the Court of Chancery, at the suit of the heir-at-law, or the next of kin, according as the property was real or personal, to declare the trust void, and the benefit of the property would then go to those entitled?—I have no doubt.

313. That would be a trust which would fail altogether?—Quite so.

314. It follows from that, therefore, that no trusts for the benefit of monasteries can with safety be disclosed?—Quite so.

315. What

315. What would you say with respect to convents?—With respect to convents, I should desire to avoid expressing a legal opinion as to whether they are, or are not, legal. I should limit myself with regard to the question of their legality, to expressing a serious doubt, such a doubt as, in my humble opinion, should not exist. Reference has also been made to the first Roman Catholic Relief Act, the 31 Geo. 3, c. 32; the section which I think was referred to was section 17.

316. Will you kindly read that section in order that the Committee may have it before them?—The general effect of the statute is not to enact any new law against monastic institutions, but to preserve the same law as was considered to be then existing.

317. It is in substance an Act for the relief of Roman Catholics from penal enactments and disabilities, is it not?—Yes, the general scope of the Act is to give a certain limited relief to Roman Catholics from certain of their disabilities. The section is, "Provided also, and be it further enacted, that nothing in this Act contained shall make it lawful to found, endow, or establish any religious order or society of persons bound by monastic or religious laws, or to found, endow, or establish any school, academy, or college by persons professing the Roman Catholic religion within these realms or the dominions thereunto belonging; and that all uses, trusts, and dispositions, whether of real or personal property, which immediately before the said 24th day of June 1791, shall be deemed to be superstitious or unlawful, shall continue to be so deemed and taken, anything in this Act contained notwithstanding."

318. I presume it may be taken to be the law before that statute that convents and monasteries, and every act connected with the Roman Catholic religion, was illegal in England?—I think so.

319. Then that Statute does not say that they are legal?—That Act seems to except monastic institutions and schools from the relief which it afforded, and then it contains a general saving of the law as to all uses and trusts which before the passing of the Act would have been deemed superstitious or unlawful. And with respect to that 17th section, I desire to mention this, that in the second of the two Acts which were passed for the purpose of sweeping out of the Statute book the various penal enactments against Roman Catholics, namely, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 59, there was a repeal of sections 12, 15, and 16, of that Act, but not a repeal of that 17th section, which I have read. That 17th section, therefore, remains the law of the land, except so far as it may have been impliedly repealed by the exemption of nuns from the penal clauses of the Emancipation Act, and also except so far it may have been affected by the Roman Catholic Charities Act, 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 115, which for the first time legalised their tenure of property.

320. Just let us take those exceptions one by one; will you just read the section in the Emancipation Act, which excludes nuns or convents of women from the operation of the penal clause of that Act?—It is the 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, s. 37: "Provided always, and be it enacted, that nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend in any manner to affect any religious order, community, or establishment, consisting of females bound by religious or monastic vows."

321. Is not the effect of that section to prevent the penal clauses of the Emancipation Act itself from applying to convents of women, but in no way to relieve them from any disability which then existed by law?—I should desire to express myself as doubting upon that point. You will observe that these proceedings might result in an attack upon their property, and I feel therefore very great hesitation in expressing an opinion that there is distinct illegality; at the same time, nobody can doubt that the question is far too serious to be pleasant for them.

322. Now let us take the other Statute that you mentioned, namely, 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 115, that only extends to Roman Catholic schools and places for religious worship, education, and charitable purposes, the same laws as Protestant Dissenters are now subject to?—Yes.

323. It does not extend generally to convents or monasteries, and so on?—Not in its terms, certainly. There have been arguments founded upon the section, particularly in the case of Bradshaw v. Tasker, and the other case that was mentioned, West v. Shuttleworth, as to its having a sort of general legalising effect with regard to Roman Catholic institutions. I should not like to lay very much stress upon that, but it is quite certain that that Act leaves the matter at best in a doubtful position, except as far as schools and places of worship and charitable purposes are concerned.

324. You have mentioned those two heads of the law; there is also another and a distinct head of the law about superstitious uses, which might also, I presume, affect property left for monasteries at any rate, supposing it to be coupled with a trust which came within the definition of superstitious uses?—No doubt that is so.

325. And even to property left in trust for a convent, coupled with a special condition, for instance, of prayers for the benefit of the soul of the donor?—Yes.

326. Have you anything to add as to the state of the law with regard to convents as it stands upon the Statute book?—Nothing further occurs to me.

327. Does that state of the law, as you have described it, operate harshly or injuriously to those institutions, in your opinion?—With respect first to monasteries, it renders it quite impossible for them to enrol any conveyances of property when it may happen, and it certainly does happen that that property sometimes is unquestionably subject to charitable trusts; it renders it impossible to them to do it without the risk of losing the property; in point of fact it would be no use enrolling a trust, which on the face of it would be void.

328. Mr. Pemberton.] You did not refer to the words "charitable trust," I think?—There would be no use in enrolling any deed that did not relate to any charitable trust, but where it happened that the deed related to a charity, and was connected with a conventual institution, then such a deed, no doubt, might be enrolled, but it would be dangerous to do it.

329. Mr. Matthews.] Would the same objection that you have just explained apply, though in a more doubtful degree, to property left in trust for convents?—Yes; for instance, if it were intended to establish a school, which of course would be a charitable trust, with a special provision that that school should be under the management of nuns, which is a very common mode of managing Roman Catholic schools, I take it that there would be a very serious question whether the trust for the school would not be vitiated by the association with it of a trust that that school should be managed by nuns. It is a question, which it is sufficient to say is open to doubt. I would not take upon myself to say that as a matter of law; the court would regard the trust for the school and disregard the other part of it.

330. It is a doubtful question in law at present?—Yes.

331. Mr. Gregory.] You assume the illegality of nuns, do you not?—No; I assume their doubtful legality, and I say that the existence of the doubt, practically, is a serious question.

332. Mr. Matthews.] Upon the general question, in your view, is a convent simpliciter a charity, if it is not connected either with a school, or with a hospital, or with some other object, clearly charitable?—Clearly not; it might happen that a convent had so completely and exclusively charitable objects, as the objects of the life of its inmates, that a bequest to them might be equivalent to a charitable bequest for those objects; but a convent per se is clearly not the subject of any charity.

333. And although the rules of a convent may prescribe that the inmates, or the members of the order, should devote themselves to good works, that would not per se make a bequest for their benefit and maintenance a charitable purpose?—I think not; I think they would consider that a trust to maintain such persons did not become a charitable trust merely because they were in the habit of doing good works. If they could make out that a certain convent was completely dedicated to the maintenance of a particular school, so that the thing had a definite character attached to it, then it is possible to construe a bequest to that convent as equivalent to a bequest to the school.

334. In like manner a bequest to a community of monks would not per se be a charitable trust?—Certainly not.

335. It might happen that some of the individuals in a monastery might fulfil parochial duties which are in the nature of charitable functions, and yet the monastery itself would not be a charitable institution?—Yes, if there were a a trust to maintain priests performing public worship in any particular localities, that would be a perfectly good charitable trust; if they were to be monks, it would be a different thing.

336. Supposing a bequest for the benefit of a house of monks, say of the Dominican Order, that would not become a charitable trust by reason of certain of those monks occasionally serving a mission or saying mass for the benefit of the people?—No.

337. Therefore in that way very few trusts in favour of monastic or conventual institutions are the subject of registration under the Charitable Trusts Act at all?—I should doubt it very much.

338. Is there any distinction between Roman Catholic charities and Protestant charities now, as far as jurisdiction, inspection, and control are concerned?—None whatever.

338*. Is it within your knowledge that in the passing of that Act it was very seriously modified in Parliament?—I believe very seriously.

339. The original intention of the Act was to save all purposes which were consistent with the usage and doctrine of the Church of Rome?—I believe so.

340. And it was modified in its passage through Parliament so as still to leave the law of superstitious uses unaltered?—Yes.

341. And therefore it struck at that portion of charitable trusts which is generally dearest to the founder?—I will not say what is dearest to the founder, but it certainly does strike at all trusts of that sort.

342. Do you know as a matter of fact whether or not the property of conventual and monastic institutions is habitually held without a declaration of trust?—I believe it be so, I believe it to be simply conveyed as though it were beneficially owned by them to two or three or more members of the community, and so from one to another, with no trusts declared.

343. Either express or implied?—No trusts declared. Whether there are implied trusts I think probably would depend upon the facts of each particular case.

344. Chairman.] What is the nature of the conveyance that people of that sort would take, because they are not to be trustees, are they to be joint tenants?—I take it that generally speaking if a community of monks buy a house for their residence, they would cause it to be purchased in the name of, and conveyed to the Reverend Messrs. A., B., and C., some three or more in number, without any declaration of trust, or anything on the face of the deed, to show that those three persons were not the owners.

345. Mr. Matthews.] In law, I presume that those three persons would be the owners?—I should like before I answered that question, to have it determined who was the owner of the purchase-money, because I take it that the Court of Chancery would hold that there was a resulting trust following the ownership of the purchase-money in many cases.

346. Mr. Pemberton.] In that view they would be assumed to be the absolute owners of it, would they not?—Yes, as joint tenants; I think I have seen such deeds, in which the phrase has been introduced as joint tenants, as well in equity as in law.

347. That would be to prevent that question arising?—It would be to prevent their title from being embarrassed by questions as to the possible existence of any trust.

348. Mr. Matthews.] Is it within your professional knowledge that properties are transferred by successive deeds from one set of trustees to another, and so on from time to time?—I have seen sufficient instances to induce me to think that that is the usual practice.

349. Then it is conveyed exactly in the way in which which any other property held by three or four gentlemen in common is conveyed?—Yes, with the same stamp duty and the same liabilities to taxation in every respect.

350. With this further inconvenience, I presume, that the property would be liable to their creditors if they happened to become bankrupt, for instance, or the survivor of them became bankrupt?—It would give rise to a question exactly the same as Miss Saurin raised when she filed a bill, and where it turned upon the question whether it was a trust or not.

351. You were concerned, were you not, in Miss Saurin's case?—Yes, in Chancery.

352. Her case in Chancery rested upon the supposition that there was no trust, and that she was a joint owner with all the other members of the community in whom the property was vested?—No, I think she happened to be one of them in the case of some of the property that belonged to the convent, but I think she asserted that it was all common property, and she desired to have it dissolved and wound up.

353. That is, assuming there was no trust?—No, not quite so.

354. Did she not claim to have it sold and partitioned?—Yes, she claimed it with respect to property in which her name did not occur, as well as that where it occurred.

355. She claimed to have the property dealt with upon the footing of a partnership and divided?—Yes, but I do not know that that case has much relevancy.

356. Has this mode of holding property by members of monastic orders operated to their prejudice?—I should think so; I have heard of one instance, but I do not know it of my own knowledge, in which advantage was taken to make a very heavy demand upon certain monks, which they were obliged to pay for the protection of their property. Somebody had an interest, or claimed an interest in the property; they considered themselves defenceless by reason of the illegality of their position; but I cannot give the details.

357. Chairman.] Could you not tell us a little more about it; how could they be defenceless?—It was not possible for them to contest the point; a claim was made, which if their institution had been of a legal character, they could have resisted by saying you have left this institution, and you have thereby lost all your rights to this property. If they had asserted that, it would have been necessary to show what the character of the institution was, and that would have been at once exposing its illegality. In short, as matters now stand, I take it that if any monk were to leave his convent, and were to make a demand exactly such as Miss Saurin made, to have the entire property of the institution sold, and to have his share paid over to him, there would be this difficulty in resisting that demand, that it would not be competent to show that according to the rules of the institution a person thus leaving lost all interest in the property, just as a member of a club, leaving the club, lost all interest in the property of the club; it would not be competent to show that, because the whole thing would be entirely illegal.

358. They could not show that without disclosing the illegality?—Precisely so; in fact they would subject themselves to penal consequences by the very fact of their bringing forward that portion of their rules, which would be at the root of the whole, that they were bound by vows. Nobody could advise them to go into court.

359. And would they not be equally defenceless against any malversation by one of the nominal owners of the property who did not administer it for the benefit of the community?—Perfectly so, I should think.

360. They would not have the means, would they, of going into the Court of Chancery and getting a trust enforced, if there were such a trust?—I think it would be a very serious question; I do not mean to say that there would be no trust affecting their property, but it would be a trust that you would get at by the doctrine of a resulting trust. You would have to show to whom it belonged before.

361. When you had declared it a resulting trust, it would be a void trust?—You must bear in mind that a good deal of their property is brought in by themselves. Supposing six or eight monks to contribute property which was their patrimony, I take it that that trust would result to them as the donors; in such a case as that they might relieve themselves from the difficulty perhaps.

362. Of course the community would be entitled when the donors of the property were no longer alive?—No doubt.

363. In effecting mortgages this state of the law renders the position of those institutions unfavourable, does it not?—Yes, I have known a case of a body of monks who desired to mortgage the house that they lived in, and some questions were asked about whether there was any trust, and it was impossible to carry out the transaction. I forget whether they were going to sell it or mortgage it, but it was impossible to carry out the transaction.

364. In consequence of those penal enactments?—Yes; in consequence of those penal enactments. My advice to them was, you cannot possibly state what the trust is for the reason that it is a trust for an illegal institution.

365. Mr. Matthews.] Then, in your judgment, do those enactments operate harshly and prejudicially upon those institutions?—Yes.

366. Do you know in what way, or from what sources they derive their chief support?—I should say that with respect to monks in a monastery a large proportion of their maintenance is derived from the fact that they serve particular Roman Catholic parish churches, and that the ordinary contributions of the congregations that attend those churches maintain them.

367. They do a vast deal of missionary work, do they not?—Yes.

368. You mean that an individual is appropriated to a particular mission, or to serve a mission?—There are particular parishes which are allocated to particular monasteries. There are particular missions, generally speaking the older missions in the country, which are served by isolated monks living out of community, and then there is a great deal of valuable missionary work done by monks who go and preach a mission at a particular parish, or take for a time the parish duty of a priest of that particular parish. In all those three ways they contribute greatly to the missionary work which is done amongst Roman Catholics in England.

369. Do they also derive any resources from schools by teaching?—Yes; some of them are teaching orders and keep schools; and, no doubt, they are some of the highest class schools in the country, and very likely profitable schools; but of that I can give you no information.

370. Is there anything else that you wish to add upon that subject?—I think not.

371. Mr. Jessel.] Assuming that at the time of the statute of the 31st of Geo. 3, there was any illegality about convents, was not it a statutory illegality?—There is an old statute to which my attention has lately been directed, the 23rd of Henry 8, chapter 10, which I believe did constitute some such statutory illegality; but I am not prepared to say whether there is any statutory illegality excepting that.

372. What I mean is this: by the old law convents were legal enough; therefore, if they were illegal at all, they must have been made illegal by some statute since the Reformation?—Things which, according to the views of the common law entertained by people who lived before the Reformation, were parts of common law, are now, by a sort of legal fiction, no longer part of common law. For instance, I take it that the Roman Catholic religion was legal enough, according to common law, before the Reformation, but it ceased in the eyes of lawyers to be legal, according to common law.

373. As a consequence of certain statutory enactments, but not ab initio?—Perhaps so; I have not been able to follow up what I may call the antiquarian part of the subject with care.

374. Has not your attention been called to this, that all the penal statutes, as far as they were known, with the exception of this Statute of Hen. 8, have been repealed?—I presume that that was the intention. There have been two repealing enactments; the one which I mentioned, the 9 & 10 Vict., and the other was the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 102; and they each abolish a very long string of enactments, but I have not been able to see that either of them repealed anything touching monasteries and convents; and the only operation of any one of them upon this matter is, that it would appear that the 17th section is excepted from the repeal of the 31 Geo. 3.

375. What I mean is this, are you aware of any Statute whatever except this one of Henry the 8th now existing, not repealed, which could make convents illegal?—No, I am not.

376. The Statute of Henry the Eighth, which we commonly call the Mortmain Act, is merely an Act for the conveyance of land?—At that time, I take it that, generally speaking, the convents were corporations, and the general operation of that Act would strike at the conveyance to a corporation; I do not mean to say that it would be limited to that.

377. Mr. Matthews.] But the enactment expressly includes communities which are not corporations?—I was not aware of it.

378. Mr. Jessel.] The object of that Act, as I understand, was this, to apply the same Mortmain laws to the quasi corporations which were also applicable to strict corporations?—Very possibly.

379. That is an Act which of course does not apply to convents, quâ convents, but to anything of that nature?—Just so; I suppose that it would be intended to apply to the vesting of property in any body which, though not strictly a corporation, had the same want of power of alienation.

380. And the same sort of perpetual succession?—Yes; I take it that in those trusts for monasteries and convents they had not then power to sell the property.

381. What I was driving at was this, that the object of that Act being to prevent the lord being cheated out of his fine, it would not apply to an ordinary conveyance to trustees for convents?—I should think not.

382. Passing, then, to the 31 Geo. 3, does not that Act merely except convents, so as to limit its operation?—I think so.

383. It does not impose any new disability on convents?—No, it says, "Nothing in this Act shall make it lawful."

384. Assuming that by reason of recent legislation, there is nothing illegal in a convent, there would be nothing in that Act to make it so?—I think there would not.

385. Will you tell me why you say that a convent is not a charity?—Take first a most simple and obvious case, say the case of a convent containing nuns of a peculiarly contemplative order. I take it that it is essential to a thing being a charity in the legal acceptation of the term, that it should be either within that statute of Elizabeth, which has been referred to or ejusdem generis; and broadly, I take it, that nothing would be a charity which would not be either for the maintenance of religion, for the public worship of some lawful religion, or for education, or for objects of public utility, such as a botanical garden, or the like, or strictly eleemosynary. I take it that you will find that almost every charity comes within one or other of those four heads; and with respect to the case of a convent of nuns of a contemplative order, such as I instanced, it is perfectly evident that they do not in any instance do anything coming within any one of those heads. If it happened that the nuns were themselves so poor as to be the objects of charity, a bequest to them might to that extent be a charitable gift, but not in any other way.

386. I suppose you will admit that a gift or bequest for the propagation or the furtherance of any lawful religion would be a charitable gift or bequest?—Clearly, even so far as a bequest to propagate the Joanna Southcote religion.

387. If you remember, in West v. Shuttleworth case, there was a gift there which was upheld upon that very ground?—Yes.

388. Would it not be charitable to give or bequeath property for the furtherance or propagation of a lawful religion in a particular manner recognised by that religion as being the proper mode of furthering or propagating the same?—Yes, I should think so.

389. Assuming that the Catholic religion recognises cognises as a proper mode of extending the religious association of men or women together, bound by vows and obliged to say a certain number of prayers, and to devote a certain time to what you call contemplation or some kind of devotion, and money or property was left or given for the purpose of founding such an institution, would not that be a charity?—I think not. I think that when I say that a trust to propagate the Roman Catholic religion would be, as undoubtedly it would be, a valid trust, it must be taken with this qualification, that it must be something that had direct reference to the propagation of religion. Now, excepting so far as their prayers might be considered to have an influence in the propagation of the Roman Catholic religion, and no doubt they make it an object of their prayers, they do not in the slightest degree profess to propagate the Roman Catholic religion; and I take it that the influence of their prayers would be far beyond the cognisance of the law. Therefore I should have no hesitation whatever in saying that a convent of nuns of a contemplative order certainly would not be in any way what the law could recognise as an instrument in the propagation of the Roman Catholic religion. I think that the propagation of religion, in order to be the subject of a trust, must be for the benefit of the community at large in a definite way. I do not think that the increase of devotion amongst certain particular persons, and the cultivation of their own private devotion, could be considered as rendering such a bequest a trust for any charitable purpose.

390. You think that a trust to induce persons to devote themselves to religious exercises would not be a trust for promoting or propagating religion under the circumstances which you have named?—No, I think not; a trust so framed as to induce persons to enter a convent would, in my opinion, not be, in any fair acceptation of the phrase, a trust for the maintenance of the Roman Catholic religion. I think that a trust for the maintenance of the Roman Catholic religion would be a charitable trust only so far as it meant its maintenance amongst Roman Catholics in general.

391. Chairman.] Do you hold a trust for the maintenance of the Roman Catholic religion to be an illegal trust?—No, quite legal.

392. Mr. Jessel.] You would distinguish between a trust for a seminary of secular priests and a trust for a seminary of regular priests?—Yes, certainly; a trust for a seminary of secular priests would be perfectly legal; but a trust which expressed upon the face of it that it was intended to educate men bound by vows would be completely illegal as tending to increase in number a body of men that the Legislature has expressly struck at.

393. My question assumes that the Statute of 10 Geo. 4 were out of question for a moment, and then would it be a charity?—I think that a trust for the maintenance of regular priests, probably would be legal, upon the ground that priests by virtue of their office, are bound to perform the functions of their religion.

394. If all monks were preaching friars, persons bound by their vows to preach and to teach religion, would not a trust for their maintenance, come within the definition of a charity?—It might be so.

395. If that is so, do you consider that the Act of 1860, which extends to all Roman Catholic charities, would necessarily exclude such an order of friars; will you look at the second section of the Act?—That Act of 1860 contains an express saving of the enactments of the Emancipation Act.

396. They are perfectly saved, but I am speaking of the second section as regards charities, as far as they are charities?—It says, "No proceedings at law or in equity shall be brought or instituted on account or in respect of any dealings, transactions, matters, or things with, or concerning any real or personal estate subject to any use, trust, gift, foundation, or disposition for any charity relating to or connected with the Roman Catholic religion which took place prior to the passing of the Act of the second and third years of the reign of King William 4th." If it had stood without the saving clause I think it might fairly have been contended that it legalised them.

397. Why would it legalise all convents except those which you have described as of a peculiarly contemplative character?—You asked me with respect to the case of a trust to maintain monks or preaching friars. I should think, though I do not express a confident opinion about it, that, apart from the statute, a trust for preaching friars would be probably a charitable trust, but there is a wide interval between that case and the other extreme case that I put first, namely, a purely contemplative order. There is a great variety of different works done, and I should think that with respect to a great number of them, it would be extremely difficult to maintain their character as charities.

398. What I understand you to mean is this, that where the nuns would have active duties to perform, be it in the practice of teaching religion or of giving education, not necessarily religious, or of attending the sick or something of that kind, as a part of their ordinary duties, they would be charities connected with the Roman Catholic religion, but in other cases they would not?—They would or might be.

399. Chairman.] Did I understand from you that you were of opinion that the conveyance of property to convents is quite legal?—The conveyance of property to trustees for convents is legal, assuming the convents to be legal.

400. They are not necessarily in practice superstitious uses?—No.

401. There is nothing illegal in them?—Nothing at all in their practices.

402. Does the legality of property being conveyed to them depend upon the purposes for which they are associated?—That is a question upon which I began by reserving my opinion. If convents, as such, are rendered illegal, then the conveyance to them would participate in that illegality.

403. But there is nothing in their having a religious purpose which should disqualify them from holding property?—Nothing that I am aware of, certainly.

404. In fact if property was conveyed to them by name, it could be held, though it be in land, naming the person to whom it was assigned?—There would be no difficulty in that; if you conveyed it to certain particular sisters or to all the sisters in the community, there would be no difficulty in doing so; only if you declared a trust for the convent, that would raise the question which I began by referring to.

405. But you could almost convey property in perpetuity in that way, always supplying those that failed?—You could keep up a succession of trustees, no doubt, but it must be observed that they must have along with that, the power of alienation by law.

406. That may be evaded if they are assumed to be joint tenants?—Evaded by not selling, but not in any other way.

407. But taking means that it should not be sold by constantly supplying the places of any deceased tenant?—Yes; but I take it that if there are a series of trustees kept up in that way, it is understood that they hold no trust for the convent?—Nobody has a right to enquire into it; they hold their property as anybody else does, by a deed conveying it to them by name?—Quite so.

408. Nobody has a right to inquire into it, nor have the Charity Commissioners any jurisdiction?—Not unless they are charities.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE CHARLES PELHAM VILLIERS, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. GEORGE MATTHEWS ARNOLD, called in; and Examined.

Mr. G. Arnold. 27 May 1870.

409. Mr. Matthews.] I BELIEVE you are a Solicitor?—I am.

410. Have you had considerable experience with reference to Roman Catholic conventual and monastic institutions?—Yes; and particularly for the last 10 years.

411. Will you be good enough to state the changes which the law has undergone with reference to the legality of monasteries and convents?—I apprehend that both monasteries and convents were perfectly legal corporations by the common law of this land; there was a tenure known to the common law, which was expressly used for the purpose of their holding lands, known by the name of Frankalmoign or free alms. Upon the members becoming professed, and taking the vows which constituted membership in those bodies, their civil rights ceased. It was the custom for such members thereupon to make their wills, and otherwise to act as persons are supposed to do in view of their natural death. The tenure of free alms was a tenure which was not only known to the law, but was approved and favoured by it, and was the subject of special advantages. For instance, a man who received land by descent had the power of alienating into Frankalmoign without the consent of his heirs. In process of time after the Conquest, the excessively burdensome tenure known as knights' service, having engrossed the greater part of the landed property of the kingdom, the tenure of free alms became obnoxious to, or interfered with, the rights of the feudal Lords in respect of wards, reliefs, and marriages, which constituted a great part of the profits of knight service; and so we find that the practice of endowing convents and monasteries as spiritual corporations, began to be checked by the statutes known as the Statutes of Mortmain, which statutes were afterwards, in the reign of Richard II., extended also to lay incorporations. That state of things continued with reference to monasteries and convents, until the change of religion at the Reformation, when by the extinction practically of the power of professing the Roman Catholic religion, these institutions and their members seem to have been dispersed, though I do not find either that vows were declared to be illegal, or that the status of a religious person as a monk or nun was destroyed in the eye of the law. I am confirmed somewhat in that view, by noticing that the second statute, 31 Hen. 8, c. 13, which abolished the larger monasteries in this country, is followed by another Act of the same year, c. 14, in which one of the things maintained by Henry VIII., in his high-handed way, is the indefectibility of vows taken.

412. Will you refer to the statute?—The 31 Hen. 8, c. 13; it will be the 4th Article, "Vows of widowhood and chastity ought to be observed by the law of God."

413. What is your view of the law since the reformation on the subject of the illegality of convents or monasteries?—My view, with reference to the legality or illegality of monasteries and convents, is quite in accordance with those which, with the higher authority of Mr. Bagshawe, were expressed to this Committee the other day at some length; that taking the 17th section of 31 Geo. 3, c. 32, in connection with the following legislation, the status of a nun or a member of a religious community of women at the present time is extremely doubtful as to its legality.

414. And with regard to a monk?—With regard to a monk, that the condition of illegality may be represented as the same as in the case of a nun, plus the clauses in the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act, the 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, s. 28 and following.

415. Now, taking the provisions as to enrolment, will you shortly state the provisions as to enrolment, which you consider at all applicable to conventual and monastic institutions?—The 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, which is the statute to which you probably refer, which is now popularly known as the Mortmain Act, was in no sort directed against institutions such as those upon which the Committee is now making inquiry. That Act passed at a period when the Roman Catholic religion was well nigh extinct as to its profession in this country, and was directed against institutions of a Protestant character.

416. There is a provision as to enrolment in the Roman Catholic Charities Act, 1860, is there not?—Yes.

417. We have been told that the fact is that it only enables the existing Roman Catholic charities to be enrolled within 12 months after the passing of that Act?—Precisely; it limited that period.

418. As a matter of fact, within your professional knowledge, has the property of Roman Catholic monasteries or convents in this country been enrolled under either of those Acts?—I think not.

419. Why not?—In the first place because the statute in question relates to charities, and these institutions are not charities according to my judgment; and secondly, because if they were charities, the enrolment of such a deed (which is tantamount to the publicity of the deed, for when a deed is enrolled in the Court of Chancery any opponent of the foundation may go, and for a few shillings obtain a copy of it) would lay it open to attack on the part of persons who were opposed to such an institution; and these institutions are so doubtful as to their legality as to render it highly imprudent for any solicitor (and these are questions which really devolve upon solicitors in point of practice, subject to the opinion of their conveyancers) to enrol them, or in other words to make them public.

420. With respect to any trust for the maintenance and support of monks, I presume you would be of opinion that there is no doubt that no enrolment of such a deed could take place with safety?—It could not with any reasonable prudence.

421. Are you acquainted with the case of Sims v. Quinlan, decided by the Master of the Rolls in Ireland?—Yes; that is a case showing that the operation of the penal clauses in the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act, have their full force, down to the present day.

422. In that case there was a petition filed by a residuary legatee, I see, for the administration of the testator's assets?—Yes.

423. A certain Catholic cleryman claimed legacies bequeathed to him; was not that so?—Yes; the penal clauses of the Act were especially the subject of the adjudication.

424. These were the bequests: "I bequeath 500 l. to the Reverend Robert White and the Reverend Bartholomew Thomas Russell, of St. Saviour's Roman Catholic Church, Dublin, or the survivor of them, to be applied as they shall deem best for the maintenance and education of two priests of the order of St. Dominick, in Ireland;" and there was also this other bequest: "I bequeath 500 l. to the Reverend Patrick Thomas Conway, of St. Mary's Priory, Cork, Roman Catholic clergyman;" both those bequests were held void by the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, were they not?—Yes.

425. I see that the marginal note of the case says, that first, "The bequest was void as contrary to the policy of the Roman Catholic Relief Act, the 10 Geo. 4, c. 7"?—Yes, the penal sections of it.

426. It was secondly held that "The bequest was for a general charitable purpose, and should be carried out cy-près under the sign manual," was it not?—Yes.

427. As to the second legacy in favour of the Reverend Mr. Conway of St. Mary's Priory, Cork, it was held, "That the bequest was void as contrary to the policy of the 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, and that being confined to a particular charitable purpose it could not be carried out cy-près"?—Yes.

428. Therefore, that legacy went to Mr. Sims, the plaintiff, as residuary legatee?—Yes.

429. I find this passage in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls: "I am of opinion, having regard to the sections of the said statute of the 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, to which I have referred, that any bequest for the education and maintenance of regular priests of an order bound by monastic vows, who have become such since the passing of the statute, is invalid, being contrary to the policy of the law. There is, however, no express provision in the Act making the bequest void. I have already stated, that I do not consider it to be a reasonable construction of the bequest, having regard to the date of the will (15th November 1861), that it was to be applied exclusively for the benefit of the monks, who were such on the 23rd of April 1829, the date on which the Act came into operation; if not, the bequest was void. If the bequest was void, as being contrary to the policy of the law, but not void by the express provision of the statute, the next question which arises is, whether the bequest should be carried out cy-près"; and then he goes on to discuss that question, and decides it as I have stated?—Yes.

430. That law, I presume, would be applicable to any trust for a monastery in England?—It would at the present time.

431. An honourable Member informs me that that was carried to appeal in Ireland; are you aware of that?—It was, and affirmed.

432. Mr. Sherlock.] Both the bequests were held to be void?—I hardly recollect whether the doctrine of cy-près was held applicable to both, but for the purpose of this inquiry, and the judicial construction of those restraining and penal clauses, the decision of the Master of the Rolls was affirmed.

433. Mr. Matthews.] It was held in error by the Master of the Rolls that the trust was invalid?—Yes; that it perpetuated an illegal community of men. The Court of Appeal held both bequests totally void by the operation of the Act.

434. You said that you concurred in Mr. Bagshawe's opinion, that monasteries and convents are not charities in the legal sense of the word. Will you give to the Committee any reasons for that opinion that occur to you?—In all such societies as we designate monasteries and convents, we find that there is a power of selling, realising, and distributing the religious house itself, which I apprehend is itself inconsistent with the maintenance of the endowment which a charity presupposes; and the control and management of the property is inconsistent with there being any perpetuation of the body. It is vested, so far as real estate is concerned, ordinarily in two or three persons, who hold it absolutely as their own, without the expression of any trusts of an enforceable kind. I apprehend that it is something like that state of things which exists where a testator gives property to a friend, and says, "Do with it absolutely as you like; I carefully abstain from imposing any trust upon you, so as not to fetter your control," which is a perfectly recognised state of things in the eye of the law.

435. We have heard of a certain number of deeds having been enrolled shortly after the passing of the Act of 1860?—Yes.

436. Is it within your knowledge whether or not any of those deeds relate to property of which monasteries or convents enjoyed the benefit?—I think not; I myself enrolled in 1861, under that Act of 1860, a number of deeds. I recollect that that I paid the Rolls Office about 100 l. for fees (though the fees are but a shilling a folio), for one bundle of deeds which I left in order to take advantage of the alteration of the law, that was with reference to such deeds as admitted of being without any imprudence placed on the roll of the Court of Chancery.

437. Were the deeds for the benefit of Roman Catholic missions, and things of that sort?—For Roman Catholic charities, where the conventual and monastic element was wanting.

438. As far as you know, no deed with a trust in favour of a monastic or conventual institution was enrolled at all?—No; it could not be with any prudence.

439. You, as a solicitor, advising your clients, the monasteries and convents, would not have advised them to enrol those deeds?—I consider that I should have been justly responsible to them for breach of duty, if I had committed such an act, and liable for damages if they had not been themselves outside the law.

440. How in your professional experience is the property held, of which monasteries and convents enjoy the benefit?—If it is fee-simple property, it is generally vested in three or four persons, either members of the institution or not, as joint tenants in fee-simple.

441. With trusts declared or not?—Without any trusts declared.

442. And how in practice is that property transmitted from hand to hand?—In the ordinary way known by the law; if one of the joint tenants should die, a good title would be shown by the concurrence in a deed of purchase of the survivors.

443. As the lives of the trustees drop, is it the practice to replace them by the lives of other members of the community?—It is.

444. And is there any conveyance executed?—There is a conveyance executed to the new and continuing owners and holders.

445. And, in like manner, without any declaration of trusts?—In like manner, without any declaration of trusts.

446. Is that mode of holding property a disadvantageous one for these institutions?—It raises questions occasionally, and in practice, in the event of a purchase by a railway company of part of the religious building, and a compulsory examination of title, it creates difficulties.

447. Do you mean that you have to satisfy the purchasers as to whether there are any equitable claims upon that property?—Yes; they are apt to imagine that there are trusts concealed, but which it is their duty to inquire into.

448. Is the property enjoyed by monasteries and convents in England for the most part real or personal property?—My friend, Mr. Harting, has made that the subject of particular investigation, and I believe that he will attend and inform the Committee.

449. You have said nothing at present about the law of superstitious uses; does that law affect in any way the status of monasteries and convents, and of their property?—It is another element of hardship and uncertainty. Under many Acts of Parliament, and especially those in the reign of George I.; for instance, a superstitious use seems to be almost synonymous with a Popish use, but the judges have endeavoured to give some more specific meaning to the words "superstitious use," and this seems to have culminated in the distinction in regard to prayers for the dead whether there is the belief or not that the soul of the person who is dead benefits by those prayers. In the case that was mentioned the other day prayers for the dead seem to have been held valid because no particular benefit was supposed to have accrued to the person prayed for.

450. Are you referring to Mitchell's case?—Yes.

451. In that case my impression is, that the decision was that our prayer, which they alleged to be a prayer for the dead, was not so in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls?—It was on an anniversary of the death. I think there is an obitur dictum of the Master of the Rolls in which he extended that, by saying that he did not think it would be illegal for members of the Established Church, even should their prayers be said on a particular day, being the anniversary of the founder, it not being under the notion that his soul would derive any benefit from them.

452. Mr. Erle cited to us the decision of Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, in which he implied that prayers for the dead were not illegal?—Yes.

453. On the other hand, masses for the dead have been held illegal quite in recent times?—Yes.

454. There was a decision on that question in Mr. Blundel's trusts a few years ago?—Yes.

455. Heath and Chapman is also a case of masses for the dead?—Yes; the gifts for requiems and masses for the dead were held superstitious and void by the vice chancellor.

456. The case of Blundel's trust is in the year 1866?—Yes.

457. Re Blundel was, I think, also a trust for masses for the founder's soul?—Yes.

458. And the trust for the mass was held to invalidate the whole bequest?—Yes. You do not find much ground for the difference in principle, because a school where the doctrine of purgatory is inculcated is lawful under 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 115, but the doctrine itself seems still to be obnoxious to the law of the land.

459. In the case of a community of monks or nuns, is there an implied duty upon them to pray for, and in the case of monks to say masses for, the soul of any donor who may benefit them?—Yes.

460. So that that implied trust would apply to all property left for their benefit?—It would.

461. It has been suggested that the Roman Catholic Charities Act of 1860 by its first section gives adequate relief to Roman Catholics against this law of superstitious uses; is that so?—I think not; I think that the provision is quite an illusory one; and I am confirmed in that by inquiries which I have made, and I find no instance in which the section has been availed of.

462. The only way in which the section could be made use of is by getting the superstitious part of the trust delared void, and the funds apportioned to some other use, is it not?—Yes; and I think if you look at the words of the section, you will see that the superstitious use must be connected with the same estate in respect of which there is a lawful use.

463. The words are these: "No existing or future gift or disposition of real or personal estate upon any lawful charitable trust for the exclusive benefit of persons professing the Roman Catholic religion, shall be invalidated by reason only that the same estate has been or shall be also subjected to any trust or provision deemed to be superstitious, perstitious, or otherwise prohibited by the laws affecting persons professing the same religion, but in every such case it shall be lawful for the High Court of Chancery" and so on?—It is not often that one and the same property would be subjected to superstitious and lawful uses.

Mr. G. Arnold. 27 May 1870.

464. You say that you have never heard of a case in which that apportionment has been made? No; I inquired also of Mr. Bagshawe on the last day the Committee met, and he had never heard of a case.

465. Do you see any good reason why property should not be allowed to be appropriated to uses that are considered pious, and in accordance with the tenets of the Roman Catholic Church?—Certainly not; I can see no adequate reason.

466. You have spoken of the way in which property is held in trust for the benefit of monasteries and convents; can you tell the Committee whether there is any general practice prevailing with regard to the mode of dealing with the private property of the members of those institutions?—Before members of those institutions become permanently members, that is, before what are called final vows, the taking of which involves a probationary interval ranging at different institutions from one to nine or ten years, they execute a will, and arrange their estate and their expectancies as far as they know them freely.

467. When you say "arrange," do you mean that they provide to what persons that estate should go?—Yes, and give effect to the arrangement.

468. Chairman.] Did you say that they do that by will only?—By will generally, because a will has the advantage of speaking from the death of the person.

469. Mr. Matthews.] Then supposing property to belong to a member of a monastery or convent, at the time of his or her profession, in what way would the income or the corpus of the property be dealt with in the interval between their entering the community and their death?—During the interval between the final vows and death, property which comes to a member would be considered as applicable to the interests of the community

470. Living of course in the community, they would share whatever income they had with the other members of that community?—Yes.

471. At their death of course the law would deal in the usual way with whatever property had come to them, either before their profession or after their profession?—Yes.

472. I understand, as the result of your experience, that these institutions have not been able in any way to avail themselves of any assistance or benefit from the action of the Charity Commissioners?—No; they and the Charity Commissioners have been kept asunder by the state of things, and the difficulties which the law has imposed upon either their applying to the Charity Commissioners or the Charity Commissioners giving them any directions. The first thing which the Charity Commissioners would do would probably be to set aside the whole of their arrangements.

473. Assuming that it pleased Parliament to repeal the penal and prohibitory enactments against monasteries and convents, do you think that that alteration of the law would be satisfactory to them?—Yes, I think it would.

474. Do you think that they would be content with that without asking for any special legislation for their benefit?—Yes.

475. They would simply ask to be let alone?—They ask to be let alone and they would trust to that increasing toleration of the day which is shown by the legislation which, from time to time, Parliament, in its wisdom, has made.

476. Let alone by the law, that is to say?—Neither helped nor hindered by any special legislation making them to differ from Her Majesty's other subjects.

477. I understand that you think that the repeal of the penal and prohibitory enactments would be all that these institutions would ask?—I think that is all that they could fairly ask.

478. Chairman.] But you want to repeal any legal disqualification on the part of these institutions in the way of their taking property?—Precisely.

479. Mr. Matthews.] Hardly that, because institutions cannot by the law of England take property unless they are corporate?—Yes, but they do not ask for a law incorporating them, but simply for relief from penalty and disability.

480. That they may be allowed to deal with property without the perils that at present hang over their heads?—Yes.

481. As with private families or the members of a club?—Yes.

482. Or as the Benchers of Lincoln's Inn or the Temple?—Yes.

483. Have you anything to add to your evidence?—No.

484. Chairman.] You heard what Mr. Erle, the Chief Commissioner of the Charity Commission, stated here on Tuesday?—I did.

485. You do not quite agree in his view of the operation of the law of 1860, I think. You state that it was not at all available for Roman Catholic charities, and that you have not benefited by it in any way?—I think he said that he only knew of one application himself, which was with reference to a school at St. Leonards.

486. But I think you have stated that it would not be prudent on the part of any solicitor to advise his clients to avail themselves of the Act of 1860 together with that of 1853; whereas, as I understood the Commissioner, he stated that he did not know why Catholics had not availed themselves of it, inasmuch as unless the charities were for an illegal purpose there was nothing to distinguish them from any Protestant charities or any other charities in the country?—Confidence in these matters, it must be remembered, is the growth of time. We have had registration of Catholic estates and property before; in the reign of George I., 1 Geo. 1, c. 55, it was compulsory for every Catholic, on attaining 21, to register in order that two-thirds should be at once confiscated. Those enactments leave their impress, and they make the descendants cautious in the matter of registration and enrolment; but I am of opinion that the difficulties of the question, and the doubts with reference to monastic and conventual charities, are quite sufficient to render it incompetent for a prudent person to approach the Charity Commission on the subject.

487. I thought you applied it to any bequest or gift for any charitable purpose; there may be that without distinct reference to a monastic institution?—Yes, applications have been made; indeed, I have myself applied to the Charity Commissioners with reference to Catholic charities not of a monastic or conventual kind; but the the date of that Act is not yet very remote, and no practice seems to have grown up on the subject.

488. But is that the reason which you assign why they have not availed themselves of that Act, or why at first there were so many deeds enrolled, and then they ceased entirely to be enrolled?—I enrol deeds nearly every month in Catholic charities, upon the legality of which in the eye of the law there is no doubt. For instance, if a church is built we, as a matter of ordinary course, not only enrol the deed now, but we set out all the trusts, which enables the Charity Commissioners who have access to the records to see what the trusts are which are impressed upon the particular church, the priest's house, and schools, and so on.

489. But the Charity Commissioner said that search had been made, and that no deeds, or, at least, very few indeed, had been found since the year 1862?—They made search, and found that there were very few declarations of trusts registered, if any. Now, my practice is to enrol all legal Catholic charity deeds, just the same as Protestant charity deeds.

490. I think he said that those 400 were so indefinite as to their purpose that they were unintelligible?—He did. That was for this reason, that the trusts would not appear upon them, and you could not enrol what was not existing upon parchment or paper.

491. But are we to infer, from what you have said, that in each of those cases the trusts would not bear investigation as regards the law?—No, I would hardly be supposed to say that.

492. But are we to infer that there was no declaration of trusts, and that they were only secret trusts?—In most cases there would be no declaration of trust, I should apprehend.

493. I think, in another part of your evidence, you said that it is the custom to convey the estate to individuals without a declaration of trust?—Yes; that is in the case of monasteries and convents, not in cases of ordinary charities.

494. Is that so, that the former are always distinguished from other charities?—Yes. If the site of a church which we call a mission were conveyed to-day, as a matter of course that would be enrolled in the Court of Chancery, and would come under the notice of the Charity Commissioners. That, however, may be more than is absolutely necessary, because by an Act of Parliament of 31 and 32 Vict. c. 44, there is an exemption from enrolment in the case of buildings for religious purposes and also buildings for purposes of art and science; but we do enrol.

495. There it would be no object to anybody to escape the supervision of the Charity Commissioners; but I assume that there are plenty of bequests or gifts which are not referable to monastic institutions, but which have something illegal or faulty in their purpose, which would make it an object not to declare the trust?—It is possible that it may be so.

496. We have had reference, I think, even to-day, to cases where the bequest was in order that the priest should pray for the soul of the donor?—Yes.

497. That is independent of any institution?—Yes; in such a case as that, if it was attached to the same property, the bad use might be rectified, and the good use maintained.

498. But what I wanted to learn from you was whether it was anything but the purpose of the gift that made it illegal?—No; I think it must be the purpose of the gift.

499. And the fact is that the illegality is confined to one or two purposes at present?—Yes.

500. It is in regard to this question of praying for the dead, or rather praying for the soul of the testator or donor?—Yes.

501. In all other respects the Catholic charities are as free from danger as the Protestant or any other?—Yes; excluding also monasteries and convents, if they be charities.

502. It seems possible that the convents may be charities; that again would depend upon the purpose for which the community was associated, would it not?—And the objects beyond themselves, perhaps, which they operated upon, such as school children and the sick.

503. We have heard of communities of women where they are purely contemplative, and have no charitable purpose; they would be excluded, would they not, from the jurisdiction of the Commissioners because they are not charitable institutions?—I should think that that would be incontestible.

504. We have heard also of convents that exist for the almost exclusive purpose of either teaching or tending the sick, and such institutions would be charitable in their purpose?—That would be in the nature of a charitable purpose.

505. Do you believe that any bequest or gift for that purpose would be illegal simply because it came into the hands of a convent, or of persons occupying a convent?—I should think that it would not, myself, but I could not say that it was free from doubt.

506. What would the doubt be founded upon; would it be upon the assumption that the existence of a convent is illegal?—And the implied obligation which exists between the members of a convent to do what in the eye of the law might be illegal, namely, to pray for the soul of the donor of the property or the benefactor of the institution.

507. Then how do you read the judgments that have been given in the courts? Is it where it is to be implied that it would be part of the duty of the devisee, or person who receives the gift, to do what is illegal, or only when the illegal act is specified in the gift?—I do not think that I rightly apprehend your question, which depends on the existence of an express or implied trust.

508. I think the judgments in the courts have left it rather uncertain whether to make a gift illegal, you must not specify something to be done that is illegal in itself; whereas, it does not follow merely from making a bequest to priests, or for the purpose of supporting a church, that it is necessary that they should do anything illegal; but I collect from your answer that you cannot give anything to the Catholic ministry without its involving something illegal to be done?—If mixed or real property, in the nature of a charity, was given to a person without any apparent, but with a real and even lawful trust, it would be competent for that trust to be set up, and the deed to be avoided under 9 Geo. 2.

509. But do you hold that bequests for the support of priests in any given place, or the maintenance of priests for the purpose of performing the service of their religion, are illegal at present?—No; I should think that after the Act of 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 115, they would not be illegal, because that is a religious or charitable purpose under that Act.

510. I want to learn the extent of the disability under which Catholics are, and it seems to be confined to this particular purpose of praying for the dead, or praying for the soul of the donor, and I cannot find that there is anything else beyond that which distinguishes the Roman Catholic charities from any others?—It is very difficult indeed to ascertain that, because of the numerous statutes bearing upon Popish and superstitious uses; but I apprehend that since the Act of 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 115, such a gift as that for a priest who ministers in the ordinary way of religion to a congregation, could not now be contended to be an unlawful charitable purpose.

510*. You would not be afraid of advising a client, therefore, to declare a trust for that purpose?—No, certainly not. The deeds relating to mission property are openly executed and enrolled now as a daily practice; I have one here which I could show you if you desired.

511. Would you think it imprudent in any other case but that of specifically praying for the soul of the donor, to advise your clients to make a declaration of trust, and to enrol the trust?—I should advise them not to make a declaration of trust in any case in which conventual or monastic purposes embraced part of the arrangement.

512. Then may I ask you whether you would not do that from the opinion which you entertain of the illegality, at present, of monastic institutions in themselves?—Yes, or the doubtful legality of them.

513. And you infer that from all the statutes being continued against them by the 10th of Geo. 4th?—No, from the Acts mentioned in the evidence of Mr. Bagshawe, the 31st of Geo. 3, c. 32, sect. 17, which saved the then state of the law against monks and nuns, the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 59, and the general legislation.

514. But as far as I understand the 10th of Geo. 4, that particular section which has been referred to, leaves every Act then existing in force against monastic institutions?—The 10th of Geo. 4, c. 7, created fresh disabilities.

515. Alluding, besides, to persons not belonging to any order?—It saved nuns, and added to monks new penalties.

516. Will you state what the new penalty is against monks?—The 28th section says, "And whereas Jesuits and members of other religious orders, communities or societies of the Church of Rome, bound by monastic or religious vows, are resident within the United Kingdom, and it is expedient to make provision for the gradual suppression and final prohibition of the same therein; be it therefore enacted that every Jesuit and every member of any other religious order, community, or society of the Church of Rome, bound by monastic or religious vows, who at the time of the commencement of this Act shall be within the United Kingdom, shall, within six calendar months after the commencement of this Act, deliver to the clerk of the peace of the county or place where such person shall reside, or to his deputy, a notice or statement in the form and containing the particulars required to be set forth in the schedule to this Act annexed, which notice or statement such clerk of the peace or his deputy shall preserve and register," under a penalty of 50 l. for every calendar month, and so forth. And then the next section is, "And be it further enacted, That if any Jesuit or member of any such religious order, community, or society, as aforesaid, shall, after the commencement of this Act, come into this realm, he shall be deemed and taken to be guilty of a misdemeanour, and being thereof lawfully convicted, shall be sentenced and ordered to be banished from the United Kingdom for the term of his natural life." The next section enables natural-born subjects, being Jesuits, to return into the kingdom and be registered. The next section gives the principal Secretaries of State power to grant licenses to Jesuits, &c., to come into the kingdom, and may revoke the same. The next section says that an account of the licenses shall be laid before Parliament annually. Then section 33 says, "And be it further enacted, That in case any Jesuit or member of any such religious order," &c., "shall, after the commencement of this Act, within any part of the United Kingdom, admit any person to become a regular ecclesiastic or brother or member of any such religious order, community, or society, or be aiding or consenting thereto, or shall administer, or cause to be administered, or be aiding or assisting in the administering or taking any oath, vow, or engagement purporting or intended to bind the person taking the same to the rules, ordinances, or ceremonies of such religious order, community, or society, every person offending in the premises in England or Ireland shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour, and in Scotland shall be punished by fine and imprisonment." Then section 34 says, "That in case any person shall, after the commencement of this Act, within any part of this United Kingdom, be admitted, or become a Jesuit, or brother, or member of any other such religious order, community, or society as aforesaid, such person shall be deemed and taken to be guilty of a misdemeanour, and being thereof lawfully convicted shall be sentenced and ordered to be banished from the United Kingdom for the term of his natural life."

517. That is a new penalty imposed by the 10 Geo. 4?—Yes.

518. It does not apply to convents?—The convents are saved by this: "provided always and be it enacted, that nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend in any manner to affect any religious order, community, or establishment consisting of females bound by religious or monastic vows."

519. Therefore you consider that by that clause the convents are saved from the new penalties imposed by that Act?—I do.

520. But if anything existed before which rendered convents illegal that still remains in force?—Yes.

521. And you consider that it would not be safe to advise any client to confer any benefit on a convent for that reason?—I adhere to that opinion, that their status is far too doubtful to declare such trusts.

522. It is under these circumstances, as you have stated it, that the law is evaded, in order to convey property for the benefit of these institutions?—I do not take it as an evasion of the law. The property is held upon a recognised tenure, and lawfully held; the estate is properly vested; the law permits it to be done, and therefore there is no evasion of the law.

523. I meant only to say that the original law was not very operative; I think I have understood you rightly that there is a conveyance to persons by name, and upon the withdrawal, or failure failure of the life, of any one of the joint tenants, it is replaced by another?—Yes.

524. And, practically, that seems to be opposed to the policy of the Mortmain Act?—No, because there is a continual succession of different owners and chance of alienation; mortmain is where the owner is continuous and the chance of alienation is taken away; but here the land is capable of being sold, and, in point of fact, is sold; it passes from these persons to others, even by sale or by mortgaging; they deal with the land; it is not as if it were vested in a spiritual corporation which never dies.

525. But property seems to be enjoyed, inalienably, by means of these successive tenancies?—No, not inalienable; perpetually alienable by the very form of the conveyance.

526. It would be an open violation of mortmain if it were not; but practically it amounts to this, does it not, that this is an arrangement for the purpose of keeping in force a trust, just as if it were granted in perpetuity?—It devolves, you will observe, by deaths. Suppose that there are three holders of the property, there is no such sense of the land being in mortmain, but that you would have to find out the heir, or that you would have to find out the devisee, or that you would have to pay duty to the Crown with reference to that devolution of property.

527. You alluded to occasions when there was either an obligation to alienate, or an interest in alienating this property; for instance, if a railway had to be made under the authority of an Act of Parliament, they could really compel the sale of that property?—Yes.

528. And, I think, that upon those occasions you state there is a difficulty about the title?—Yes, occasionally.

529. From your experience, would you tell us how that difficulty is met; the first inquiry would be as to whether there is a trust, would it not?—Yes; and the answer is, that the persons who hold are absolute owners.

530. And that satisfies the purchasers, or those to whom it is assigned?—Generally.

531. What is the state of the case when they have received the money for the property; do they consider themselves bound, as other trustees might be, to invest in other land, and upon the same trusts on which the land was held before?—It all depends upon the shifting circumstances of each particular case.

532. But do you know of any case where other land that has been purchased, or where the money has been reinvested, and where the persons so selling or transferring the property have the same trusts to protect?—I can call to mind at the present moment no case in which money has been directly received from the sale of land, and the same sum invested in the purchase of new land; generally it is invested in the funds, or in something else.

533. May we infer, from what you state, that latterly there has been no risk or inconvenience experienced by those who hold property in this manner by being occasionally obliged or induced to alienate it?—There is the inconvenience of overhanging doubts and questions, such as have been ventilated before you on this occasion, which is not inconsiderable.

534. But you have never experienced any; none within your experience have occurred?—I have had such a case as persons refusing to convey where land has been contracted to be sold, we will say, for a monastery, and paid for, and the contract has been endeavoured to be enforced. I have been kept for years waiting in such a case, because I had no power at law, or because I distrusted my power at law of enforcing that contract, in consequence of the penal character of the law.

535. But you never knew of any difficulty arising from the purchaser considering himself obliged to see to the application of the money?—No, I have had no case in which that difficulty has been maintained.

536. Is it not the case sometimes that you must see to the application of the money?—Ordinarily, if you are a trustee the purchaser would require to see the limits of your trust, and whether you had power to give a receipt for the purchase money.

537. There is, practically, no inconvenience felt by these religious institutions in holding property in consequence of the conveyances made to them?—We think that there is great deal of inconvenience.

538. I mean inconvenience to themselves from the scheme which they resort to, and are perhaps obliged to resort to, from the state of our law?—It is the most convenient course that they can adopt to meet the necessities of the position in which they are placed.

539. What would be their position, supposing that the law was altered in regard to the disability under which they labour now, of the uses being superstitious or themselves illegal, if they wished to acquire property?—They would then be able to enrol such of their deeds as related to realty, and acknowledge the trusts.

540. And you believe that that would be done if the law was altered?—It probably might.

541. But I do not collect from you that there is any objection on the part of the Catholics to the operation of the Charity Commissioners?—We believe that the Charity Commissioners act very fairly and very reasonably, in all such matters as are submitted to them.

542. They see to the administration according to the intention of the donor, and they call for accounts?—I think that is not so much the operation of the Charity Commissioners as this, that where there are difficulties you may apply to them to remove those difficulties; it is a remedial jurisdiction, and also for the prevention and the restriction of applications to the Court of Chancery, and of waste of charity funds in law suits, and so forth.

543. And the Catholics have no objection to avail themselves of whatever advantage is conferred by that commission?—No, I think not, generally.

544. Mr. Jessel.] You say that if you got rid of the penal clauses of the Roman Catholic Relief Acts as regards monasteries, that is all you want?—I confess that I had not formed any definite opinion as to the extent of what we required, nor should I feel that I was competent to be the expositor of what the Catholic body, generally, would wish upon the matter; I suggested that those clauses are so highly penal, and so contrary to your legislation at the present day, that they might very fairly be repealed.

545. You told us that as regards railways, in case of sale, you find a difficulty; I did not quite catch what the difficulty was; will you explain it?—In the case of property vested in joint tenants, whether there was any trust or not.

27 May 1870.

546. But what difficulty could arise even if there were a trust; there would be no difficulty in selling to a railway by trustees?—In any other case, the case for instance of a private purchase where land is vested in trustees, you are open to inquiry if the building is supposed to be used for a quasi public purpose, whether these persons are really the owners, or whether they do not represent some other body which is the real owner.

547. Your answer is, that they are absolute owners?—Yes.

548. And that, I suppose, is generally accepted?—Yes.

549. And therefore there is no practical difficulty?—No; it may not, perhaps, prevail.

550. Was this ever suggested to you, that the conveyance of the legal estate of the monastery was invalid; because you have told us that they were the owners in law?—No; the persons not taking as monks, but taking in their rights as citizens.

551. But assuming for a moment, what I think you will not readily dispute, that a monastery is now wholly illegal, and that land is conveyed to persons by name upon trust for that monastery (I do not mean that the trust is expressed in the deed, but that it can be proved aliunde to exist), would that be a good conveyance at law?—It would be good until you could show the existence of that trust.

552. I am assuming that you could bring evidence to show that the property was purchased upon trust for the monastery; would that be a good conveyance at law?—I fear that it would invalidate it.

553. Therefore, I mean you could not really make a title if the purchaser were informed of the true state of the case? — If it could be proved.

554. You said that there was great doubt about the status of the convents. Have you ever been advised that a convent is illegal?—I have never been distinctly advised that a convent is illegal; but the extinction of everything connected with religious houses and religious professions, and the practice of the religion itself being void, all the scope and tenor of the legislation in times past seems to have gone upon the basis of such being the case.

555. I do not mean to suggest that at one period they were not illegal, but I am referring now to modern times, since the Roman Catholic religion has been made legal?—Then it has been also contended that perpetual vows apart from statutes, for poverty, obedience, and in restraint of marriage, are contrary to public policy, and so a question has been raised with reference to the validity of the convents, and of property given in trust for them.

556. As far as you are aware, is there any decision or even any dictum to that effect?—No, I find no judgment.

557. Again, may I ask you if your attention has been called to the repeal of the various Acts (you know they were very numerous), as regards superstitious uses; at least I believe they are repealed, with only two well-known exceptions?—That Act of the 23 Hen. 8, c. 10, is still in force, which is also a mortmain statute against quasi corporations, such as guilds, &c., and the Act of 1 Edw. 6, c. 14.

558. They were purposely left with those exceptions; I believe they are all gone?—It is impossible to say, the repertory is so very extensive.

559. You do not know of any one remaining?—No.

560. Therefore you do not know of any statute prohibiting convents?—No; there was a statute after the suppression of the lesser monasteries (31 Hen. 8, c. 6) giving to religious persons the right to sue and be sued, restoring to those particular individuals their civil existence; but I find no law declaring vows per se to be illegal.

561. Then in fact the illegality, if I may say so, rests rather on the painful impression from past legislation than on any positive enactment or positive decision?—I think it is more than an impression.

562. I should like something definite if you know of anything?—The whole tendency of the law has gone upon the assumption of the illegality.

563. That is to say, from the time of the Reformation till the time when the Roman Catholic religion was again made legal, of course the practice of that religion, and everything connected with it, was illegal; therefore during that time the law was well defined and well understood; but that state of things having passed away, what is there now to make it illegal?—It is open to great doubt in the mind of sounder lawyers than I can pretend to be.

564. I want to ask you now something about the mode in which the individual members of these institutions deal with their property; as I understood you, before taking final vows they make a will usually?—Yes.

565. What becomes of the income of their property in the meantime, that is, until they die; is that devoted to the purposes of the community?—There is no general rule upon those points; the practice differs very materially and considerably. Before final possession, a person looks round and sees what is due to his family and his natural ties, and provides for them, makes his will, and settles his worldly affairs, because one of the things that he has to do upon entering into membership, is to make a vow of poverty that he will not possess property.

566. You have told us that first of all he makes a will; of course that could only operate on the property retained, and that involves, therefore, the assumption that he retains some property?—The will would not divest him of the property; it has no effect in præsenti.

567. Supposing that a gentleman possessed of a thousand acres of land becomes a member of a monastery, or that a lady possessed of a similar estate, becomes a member of a convent, and takes the vow, you say that he or she makes a will; but there is a considerable rent or income from the property; what becomes of that?—The usual plan is not only to make a will, but to arrange all the worldly affairs of which there is any knowledge at all.

568. Is it an arrangement by deed, so as finally to dispose of the property?—Yes; the dowry which is taken in convents (of which I have more particularly had knowledge than of monasteries) ranges from 1,000*l.* to 200*l.*; that is considered ordinarily and necessarily to be paid; the application of the rest is a matter dependent upon the circumstances of the person, and what is fair and right to be done under the circumstances of the case.

569. You say that you are more familiar with the case of convents; do I rightly understand you you that the nun divests herself of all her property at the time that she takes the vows?—Entirely, to its known extent; that is my experience.

570. Then there is nothing left for the convent except the dowry?—Yes.

571. Supposing that property is acquired by the nun after taking the vows, what becomes of that?—It would belong to the community; that would be the ordinary course.

572. She disposes, in fact, of all her then property; and her future acquired property, from the time she takes the vows to the time of her decease, passes with it?—Anything which devolved upon her from the time that she was a professed nun would, under ordinary circumstances, be considered the property of the institution.

573. I was going to ask you one question which, perhaps, you will hardly be able to answer; my friend Mr. Matthews asked you if there was any difference in dealing with that property from what there would be in the case of a club, or the benchers of Lincoln's Inn; has your attention been called to the law against perpetuities?—Slightly.

574. Would not a trust for a convent or a monastery be in the nature of a perpetual trust?—I should hardly feel competent to give an opinion upon that without further consideration.

575. Mr. Newdegate.] So far as you are aware, there is a conflict between the laws by which these monasteries and convents are regulated according to their own will and the law of England?—No, I do not say that; it is perfectly in accordance with the law of England that the joint tenants hold the property.

576. But the members of these institutions, and you as their adviser, are not satisfied therewith; that is to say, with the law as it exists?—The law is highly penal as regards men; and you could not expect a person to be satisfied with the liability to being banished or imprisoned for no crime.

577. You term the law penal because it is in restraint of monasteries?—In restraint of being in the country.

578. In restraint of monasticism and in restraint of such societies as that of the Jesuits?—And the mere being in the country is constituted an offence, although the person be a subject of Her Majesty, pay his rates and taxes, and discharge his duty in every possible respect.

579. You object to that law as penal because it is in restraint of such institutions or orders of the Church of Rome?—I object to it because it infringes the liberty of one of Her Majesty's subjects; a Jesuit, although he has that religious profession, is a subject of Her Majesty, and discharges all his duties, and I object respectfully to his being placed in a criminal position because of his religious opinions.

580. Then you complain of the law because it notices the fact, as a fact, that this person is either a monk or a Jesuit?—If it did not do any more than notice the fact, I should not complain of it.

581. The law proceeds upon the fact; do you object to the law proceeding upon the fact?—I do not think that I can carry my answer further than I have, I object that a subject of the Queen, performing all his other duties, should be subject to these grievous pains and penalties because of his conscientious religious opinions.

582. That is to say, you object that any subject of Her Majesty should not be at liberty to become a monk or to become a Jesuit, and in that case devise property to the community to which he belongs?—No; I do not think that that correctly represents my objection.

583. I will not press you any further upon that subject. You spoke with respect to property; is it not the fact, that after the final profession of a nun the law of the community which she enters, particularly if it is a cloistered convent, considers that person civilly dead except as forming a portion of the community which she has entered?—Such used to be the law.

584. I am speaking of the law of the community, not of the law of England; is not the case as I state it?—No, certainly not.

585. The law of England does not consider the nun civilly dead?—Well, it is very difficult to say what is the state of the English law upon these precise points; I find no Act of Parliament bearing upon it; the common law clearly did.

586. You are not aware that the law of England and the practice of the courts has decided that a nun is not civilly dead?—If you are alluding to Metcalf's case, a case before Lord Justice Knight Bruce, I recollect that case; it was a case of alleged undue influence, and it was held there that it was the natural thing that a nun should execute such a deed as she did because she was a nun; that is to say, that there was no evidence of undue influence.

587. And that she had legal capacity to execute that deed?—Yes; there was an argument raised about the profession being in England or abroad; under the old law profession abroad was disregarded because the law had no means of obtaining cognisance of it.

588. But it has been decided up to the present time that a nun is not, by the law of England, civiliter mortua?—Certainly, with reference to the execution of a deed, for instance.

589. But according to the terms of the profession and the vow of poverty, all property accruing to this citizen of Her Majesty would go to the community?—Yes, after profession in ordinary cases.

590. That was proved in Saurin's case?—Yes, after the final profession.

591. Then let me ask you whether you are aware that a learned Roman Catholic writer, Count Montalembert, confirmed recently by the opinion of Mr. Wells, is that altogether the Roman Catholic Church has more liberty in this country than in almost any other State of Europe?—I should not think so; this present inquiry is rather in the opposite direction.

592. An inquiry is not legislation; but are you prepared to deny the opinion expressed by those two persons?—If you would ask me a closer question, whether a convent is inspected in France, for instance, and not in England, or anything of that sort, I would answer you; but I am not competent to give an answer to so broad and comparative a question as yours.

593. I put the question broadly because you have gone into a great number of particulars, and I wish to know the inference and purport of your evidence, and to be allowed to ask whether you differ from those persons whom I have mentioned?—As to the extent of comparative immunity which convents enjoy in England and foreign countries, I should say that some of the convents in France, for instance, are legally acknowledged by the State, recognised by the

27 May 1870.

State, and protected by the State; now we have nothing of that kind.

594. But in France there is a distinction drawn between some convents and some of the male orders, and others, and the law deals with them?—It does so; there are two kinds.

595. Do not those recognitions prove that the laws of France operate more directly upon these communities than the laws of England do?—In France a convent, or monastery, may have the advantages of incorporation, and may have a perpetual existence. Now that you deny us, we have no such advantage as that.

596. That is the advantage which you desire?—Well, I am merely a unit; I have no authority to make any representation on behalf of the Roman Catholics of this country.

597. In your opinion, should those advantages be granted to convents here which are granted to the convents abroad, authorised by the laws of France?—I have not considered the subject sufficiently.

598. But the complaints you make rather show that you are discontented, because they have not those privileges?—No; there is a wide difference between a thing being illegal and being erected into a corporation. I may fairly object to penalties and illegalities without claiming a perfectly legal incorporation of such a society as a convent with its legal incidents.

599. The illegalities, according to the clauses which you have read yourself, are intended to be restraints?—Yes, they evidently are so intended.

600. And of those you complain?—Yes, I complain, and very justly, I think.

601. Mr. Pease.] I gather from your evidence that monastic institutions, as such, are illegal in this country?—Yes; I think that is fairly stating the case.

602. That lands held by them practically as a matter of law are held simply by private persons? Yes, that is so.

603. Without trusts?—Without trusts.

604. And that personal property the income of which actually goes to these establishments, is also held merely as private property without trusts?—That is so.

605. And property left for charitable purposes, belonging to Roman Catholics, vested under the care of members of a monastic institution would not be a legal trust, and would not be returned to the Charity Commissioners?—Not if the trust savoured of a monastic purpose.

606. The same remarks only apply in a different degree to property and trusts held by convents?—Yes, in a limited degree.

607. You told us that the individuals entering these establishments made their wills previous to their taking the final vows?—Yes.

608. In these wills, if property is intended for the purposes of the houses to which they belong, after their decease, is it left exactly in the same way without trusts to private individuals?—Yes.

609. Then the fact is, that the whole of the property of these establishments, whether coming in real estate, or in personal estate, or by will, is all held on honour?—Yes, it is generally.

610. You spoke of the damage which sometimes arose on the question of title, from the inability of the parties thus holding on honour to sell to railway companies, and other parties, who had compulsory powers of purchase. Has that really been any practical damage?—Or in voluntary purchases as well; it is more serious in voluntary purchases than in others, where there is a desire to sell, and difficulties have arisen in such cases.

611. In your experience have difficulties occurred?—Yes, they have.

612. They are the exception, and not the rule?—Yes, they are the exception, and not the rule.

613. On the death of one of three trustees likely to hold a real estate, the succession duty is paid on one-third?—Yes, it would be payable.

614. Is that succession duty avoided by the transfer of the property previous to the death of an old trustee?—It would not have accrued (that would be the best answer), because, before the person died, he would have ceased to be the holder.

615. You keep the trust alive, and constantly going, independent of the question of death; that is the practice?—Yes.

616. You have alluded to the inability which was either continued or imposed by 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, and you read the 28th section. Do not the Roman Catholic priests frequently moving about belong to the order of Jesuits and different orders which are prohibited by Section 28?—I have seen persons whom I believe to be Jesuits, constantly.

617. And they appear in their peculiar dress at ceremonies outside the church, at funerals, and in other places?—Their habit would not be visible then; they would have the vestments of a priest on, and you would not see whether they had got their habit or not.

618. Mr. Bourke.] Do you know of any monastery or conventual establishment that is, in your opinion, in point of law a charity?—No, I do not.

619. Then, so far as you know, no monastery or conventual establishment in England can be subject to the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners in law?—I think that is so.

620. You have used the phrase "quasi monastic establishments," "a charity," I think you said, in the nature of a monastic establishment, or words to that effect. Now do you know of any such institution in England?—The definition of a monastery, I apprehend, is where persons take the three perpetual vows and live together; "quasi" must mean persons who more or less come up to that standard.

621. Do you know any quasi monastic charities in England?—I know institutions where they do not take those vows, and they might be considered as quasi monastic.

622. Would they come under the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners in point of law, do you think?—No, I think not.

623. Why not?—There are not the badges of a charitable institution about them.

624. Then it is your opinion that there is, in fact, no conventual or monastic establishment in England that can come within the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners by law?—That is my opinion.

625. Mr. Gregory.] You have told us that the real property of these institutions is vested in trustees as joint tenants, and ostensibly on the face of the deed they have the beneficial as well as the legal interest?—They have; the words are "in joint tenancy as well in equity as at law"

626. In case of the death of one of them you pay pay succession duty upon the right accruing to the survivors?—Yes, it would be payable.

627. And personal property is vested in the same way?—Yes.

628. How are the trusts in those cases practically ascertained?—The holders of the property manage it as if it were their own, guided doubtless by the views and wishes of the members of the house to a greater or less extent.

629. You mean subject to the views of the members, expressed by the house or a majority of the house?—No, I mean generally in accordance with the genius and with the interests of the community. As the owners of the property they act in the interest of the community.

630. Do they act of their own free will, or under the direction of the community?—Of their own free will.

631. Without any appeal?—In a family, you have no appeals.

632. That is just what I wanted to know, whether it is strictly in the relation of a family, or whether there is any jurisdiction exercised over them?—It is strictly in the relation of a family.

633. Without any external jurisdiction whatever?—Without any external jurisdiction whatever.

634. It is merely on the motion of the members?—These members, who hold the property, are generally the chief persons.

635. And they have an absolute jurisdiction over the management of the property?—And exercise it.

636. You said that persons before taking the final vows made a will disposing of their property; but, as I understood you, in answer to Mr. Jessel, you said that that was in fact a deed?—No, it is a will; but they arrange all their worldly affairs; they are, as it were, taking leave of the world, and arrange all their worldly affairs which they then have cognisance of, and beyond that they make their will providing for the future.

637. You say that they arrange their affairs; do they arrange their affairs by any instrument?—By the division of their property.

638. Upon what is the will to operate?—Upon anything that may come afterwards.

639. The will is only to provide for future property?—Yes, and unexpected contingencies.

640. And all the property belonging to them up to that time is arranged by deed?—By delivery or according to the convenience of the case.

641. By conveyance, I presume, first in the case of realty, and by delivery in the case of personalty?—Yes, where a conveyance is requisite. Far the greater majority of persons who are members of religious institutions are poor persons who have no estates; those who have estates would regulate them by conveyance, by sale, by distribution of the proceeds, and so forth, and they generally would arrange their affairs as if they were going to die.

642. These wills, I suppose, are subject to probate in the usual way?—Yes, and the duty paid.

643. With respect to the Charity Commissioners, you are aware that their jurisdiction extends to the inspection and regulation of charities?—It does.

644. To the inquiry into their objects and seeing how those objects are carried out?—Yes, and giving advice and preventing waste.

645. But still more to regulating the application of the property among the objects of the charity?—They could not do that with so many charities as there are in England.

646. I was talking of their legal powers; their functions do not extend to that?—In theory they do.

647. Do they not under the Act of Parliament by which they are constituted?—They are authorised to inquire into charities under the 43 Elizabeth.

648. Do you object to come under all the jurisdiction of the Charity Commission as it exists?—If it is a charity I do not object, of course; my objection rather relates to the antecedent ground that these are not charities.

649. You except them from the jurisdiction on the ground that they are not charities?—Yes; and all religious buildings, if you notice, are exempted from the Charity Commissioners by the 62nd clause of their Act.

650. Mr. Talbot.] I understood you to say that one of the complaints which you make as to the present condition of the law respecting monastic institutions is, that a person is a criminal, a misdemeanant, at any rate in the eye of the law, who is a monk?—A monk who comes into the country, or a person who is made a monk in this country.

651. In fact, that he offends against the law simply by being a monk?—By being made a monk in this country.

652. Either taking vows in the country, or coming into the country, having taken the vows?—Yes; and so also with the person who admits him to the order.

653. You wish that to be altered?—I think it is so obviously harsh, and contrary to the progressive amelioration of the laws, that I submit it would be wise to alter it.

654. What would be your opinion as to the best way in which the law could be altered so as to give relief to the people for whom you speak?—To make no difference between Roman Catholics and any other subjects of Her Majesty as to matters of religion and conscience.

655. That any person who liked should be able to take vows in perpetuity?—The perpetuity can only last during their lives.

656. That is what you are aiming at, removing all disabilities for the taking of perpetual vows?—I am not aiming at anything, but I think that it would only be fair and right that those highly penal clauses should be removed from the statute book.

657. The words are "conventual and monastic"; now, is the only distinction between "conventual" and "monastic," that a convent is a place for women, and a monastery a place for men?—That has come to be the meaning in modern days.

658. It is an abuse of language, is it not?—Yes; the term "convent" applies to monasteries as well, but it is the conventional term of the day.

659. We have had it assumed that a convent is a place where only women are?—It is so accepted now.

660. Then there is, in fact, no distinction in sex between the two?—No; but the terms have acquired that conventional distinction.

661. Mr. O'Reilly.] You were asked whether you suggested the removal of all disabilities for the taking the perpetual vows; let me ask you what, what, in the eye of the law at the present moment, ordinarily speaking, is a vow; is it any restriction of the subject of which the law can take cognisance?—It is only in foro conscientiæ.

662. You do not suggest that the law should in any way enforce that resolution on the part of men or women, for instance, not to marry?—Certainly not.

663. Therefore is it that your objection is that the law should punish an internal act of the will, which is perfectly voluntary, and which the law is not in any way called upon to recognise or enforce?—Yes; it seems unfair and unjust.

664. You stated that before persons took the vow they generally, or almost invariably, disposed of their property by deed, by act, or in some other way?—Yes, that is so.

665. Have you known any cases in which the person so taking a vow, being a man, for instance, was the heir of considerable property?—Not very considerable property.

666. Are you acquainted with the case in which the heir to a baronetcy, for instance, and some landed estates, took such vows as conveyed all his property to his second brother; have you heard of such a case, or would such a case surprise you?—I have heard of such a case; he would reserve some sum for the religious house into which he was to enter, 1,000 l., or something of that sort.

667. But probably he would make over the bulk of his property?—Yes, to his family.

668. A good many questions have been asked as to how far conventual institutions would come under the legal definition of charities, and the Charity Commissioner said that it was a question that would depend greatly if not entirely on the facts of the case. Now I wish to call your attention to a state of facts which your experience will probably confirm as common with regard to convents; is it not the fact that in the case of many convents of women, for instance, the property of the convent is the property of all the members collectively, and they, by mutual agreement, may do what they like with it; for instance, sell it all, and take the proceeds elsewhere. For example, a community of women who own a house and other property in London, and there take a school, and carry out other works of charity, may sell it all, buy a house in another part of England, or out of England, go and live there, and teach a similar or a different sort of school?—Yes.

669. Is it not the fact that that is a very common state of things among convents?—Yes, not uncommon.

670. Would you think that such a body of persons could be removed from the legal definition of a charity and the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners, because there would be no precise purpose in that case which they could assist to enforce at all?—Yes, it puts an end to the existence of that permanent endowment which seems to be the essence of a charity.

671. And is it not within your knowledge that such is frequently the case in England?—Occasionally.

672. Frequently the case that they may do it, and occasionally that they do it?—It is always the case that they may do it.

673. But I suppose that if there was an endowment left for the maintenance of a specific convent in a specific place in England, with the obligation attached of teaching a school in that particular place, assuming such an endowment to be legal, that might be considered a charitable endowment under the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners?—Yes.

674. But as far as your knowledge goes, is it not the fact that the great majority, if not all the cases of convents in England, come under the other description?—Yes.

675. Chairman.] If any property was left to any of these persons in a convent after the final vows had been taken, could anybody, a trustee, for instance, refuse to pay that money because the person was civilly dead?—Do you mean in her lifetime, or after she dies?

676. I am assuming, for instance, such a case as arises under a marriage settlement; the parents may die after she has taken the final vows, and a question may then arise as to her portion being paid?—They would have to pay her in that case.

677. And the law would not protect them, or the executor, or the residuary legatee, in alleging that she was civilly dead, and could not take property?—No.

678. Mr. Newdegate.] I wish to ask for an explation of one answer of yours. You said, did you not, that the Roman Catholic charities are now generally enrolled?—No; I said that the foundations of the missions for churches were generally enrolled, the house for the priest and schools. I, in my own practice, invariably enrol them.

679. Under what statute?—Under the general statutes, with regard to charities, relating to the enrolment of real estate.

680. Mr. Hatfield's Act, you mean?—Since 1860.

681. Including Mr. Hatfield's Act?—I do not call to mind that Act; that enabling statute of 1860 is extended and amplified by an Act of the next Session, and then by an Act of the Sessions afterwards.

682. You made an exception of monastic and conventual institutions as not enrolled?—Yes, we do not venture to enrol them.

Mr. William Henry Gunning Bagshawe, again called in; and further Examined.

Mr. Bagshawe.

683. Chairman.] I believe you wish to make an addition to an answer which you gave last time?—I wish to say one word in explanation of one answer of mine on the former occasion. I stated that I did not consider, to take the instance of a legacy to a contemplative order, that that would be a legacy to a charitable purpose, because such an order did not take part, I considered, in the promotion of the public worship of the Roman Catholic Church. But I desire to guard against the idea that I think the illegality of any monastic institution is consistent with the free action of the Roman Catholic Church. I consider that it is essentially part of the practice arising out of the doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church that there should be such institutions, and consequently that if they are rendered illegal to that extent, the free action of the Roman Catholic Church is interfered with by law. At the same time that I think that any illegality should be removed removed which affects those institutions, I do not in the slightest degree wish to see them privileged, or their vows recognised, or anything connected with them recognised. I should desire to see them left simply upon the footing of ordinary voluntary associations, subject in all respects to the law of the land as respects perpetuities, and as respects the obligation of enrolling charitable deeds, and as respects the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners, whenever those apply.

684. Your observations in that respect apply to all institutions of this religious character?—Yes.

685. You referred especially to convents in cases where they were of a contemplative character, with no charitable object? — I mention those because on the former occasion I had mentioned them as being the cases in which I thought it clear that the institutions were not of a charitable character; but I think that, whether charitable or no, whether contemplative or no, they are all the result of the free action of the Roman Catholic Church,—differing very much amongst themselves.

686. Do we rightly infer that you make a recommendation in consequence of the view which you now entertain as to the law?—If it is competent to me as a witness to make a recommendation, I would say that I think that the action of the Legislature should be simply to remove any illegality, in the one case certain, in the other case doubtful; but that in the removal of such illegality, the Legislature might, and probably would, guard itself against anything like the recognition of those bodies as of a corporate or quasi corporate character, or as having any vows of a legal character; they should, in fact, leave them to the ordinary laws of the country in every respect.

687. Mr. Jessel.] When you say that they should leave them to the ordinary laws, would you, or would you not, recognise vows as contracts?—I would certainly not by law recognise a vow as a contract binding the party to the observance of the vow, but I would recognise a vow to this extent, that if a certain body of persons chose to make it part of the agreement amongst themselves, that they should be members only so long as they observed certain vows, while I would not require that that should be recognised by the law, I would say that there should be nothing in the law which rendered it unlawful; for example, for a given number of ladies to contract that they will live together in a certain institution, so long, and so long only as they think fit to abstain from marriage.

688. But on the other hand, supposing there were a vow for a valuable consideration, made either by men or women, that they would live together for life unless released by a superior, and that all their property should belong to the community, would you legalise that?—I would not legalise any contract which bound a man by anticipation, that all property that he should acquire should belong to any institution.

689. That has been decided, has it not? — I think, perhaps, your reference is to a decision of Lord Langdale's, to the effect that a man was bound by a contract that all the property which he might acquire, from whatever source, during the whole remainder of his life, should be settled, not upon nuns, but upon some secular purpose that existed in that case; I have always thought that a most wonderful decision.

690. Supposing that to be the law, you would not desire the law in that respect to apply to these vows?—No.

691. Therefore you would still require some special legislation on the subject?—No, because my impression is, that the law would not give effect to any such contract.

692. Chairman.] The law would not give effect to such a contract without any reference to a religious purpose, but if a money lender was to make an arrangement with a man who had prospects, do you say that the law would not recognise that?—No, to give a security upon all one's property for what was a definite sum lent, would be a different thing.

693. Suppose that it was anticipating all his property, whatever it might be?—If he were to anticipate it by way of absolute alienation, I think myself, that it would be bad, but at the same time if it were for a valuable consideration of money, it might be subject to different conditions from any that I can conceive would affect any such contract as a monk or a nun could enter into; but it is new to me that any such contract is in fact entered into by monks or nuns.

694. Mr. Newdegate.] With regard to the answers which you have just given, you wish that the law of England should practically ignore the laws and constitution of monastic and conventual institutions?—I think that the law of England should stand thus: that with respect to any given community, if a question arose as to the property of that community, the law should inquire, "What contract have you entered into with respect to ownership of that property;" exactly as if a dispute were to arise with respect to any club, and the ownership of the property belonging to that club, the Court of Chancery would inevitably inquire, what are the rules of the club, and have they been complied with, or are they broken in the proposed dealings with property. I may observe, in the first instance, that, except as respects property, I think the law should wholly ignore these associations. I cannot conceive that any question respecting monks or nuns could arise before the law, excepting so far as affected their property. I set aside, of course, all cases of personal liberty, which would fall within the criminal law; I do not propose in the slightest degree to interfere with that; I take it that the law which gives every person a right to his personal liberty would wholly ignore any contract, if any such there be in restraint of liberty; that is to say, if a monk or a nun were to desire to quit their convent, and any attempt were made to set up the plea, "You have made a vow obliging you to remain here," the law would utterly disregard any such contract, and I think it should continue to do so. But I say, excepting as regards personal liberty, and as respects property, I think that the law has nothing to do with such institutions.

695. We will take this case; you would not have the law consider whether the allegiance of such a person was affected by the nature of the institution which he had entered, or of the obligations which he had undertaken?—I see no case for supposing that any allegiance could possibly be interfered with. I am not quite sure, however, that I understand the question.

696. What you recommend, practically comes to this: that the laws of this country should proceed without reference to these institutions, when the laws of scarcely any other country do so?—I am not aware that the statement contained in the latter part of your question is in accordance with the fact. I know nothing whatever, and I am not in a condition to give you any evidence whatever as respects the laws of other countries; but if you could show me any other country where there existed the same complete protection for the liberty of the subject that is given in this country by the action of the law of habeas corpus, and many other similar provisions of our law, and you were to tell me that in the law of such a country as that convents were rendered illegal, I should only say that I would not follow that example.

697. I will put the question generally; you wish that in the matters which you have stated, the law of England should ignore the constitution of these societies completely?—I think that there should be no general provision whatever of the law relating to their constitution; I think that the result of that would be, and should be, that they would be left to the action of the ordinary law of the Court of Chancery as respects valid trusts, one provision of which, amongst others, I might mention would be this: that if there were any attempt to create a trust or property in favour of a convent, so as to render it inalienable beyond the life or lives in being, and 21 years afterwards, that would be bad, and it should continue to be so, I think.

698. Are you aware that the difficulty with respect to the accumulation of property in mortmain, originated in the very state of things which you recommend us to revert to?—No; I am aware that before the Reformation all the more important monasteries and convents were as completely corporations in the eye of the law, and as competent to hold land perpetually, as, for example, any one of the city companies; and that is a state of things to which I do not propose to revert. And I may just mention that at the early period which you refer to, the branch of law applicable to cases other than those of corporations, what is called the law of perpetuities, was not well ascertained. The provision that I have referred to is not to be found in any statutory enactment; but what I may call the common law as respects restraints upon alienation, namely, that no trusts can be valid which prevent alienation beyond the period that I have mentioned, was not well understood till long after the Reformation.

699. The reason why I adverted to that was this, that I believe, though you may not be aware of the fact, that the struggle which went on between the civil and the ecclesiastical power, went against the civil power and the common law, because cases in equity were in the hands of the clergy?—I am not aware of that.

700. Were you examined before the Committee of 1851–52?—No.

701. It was a relation of yours perhaps?—Possibly my father; I do not know.

702. I wish to ask you, as a person in the confidence of the Roman Catholic body, whether the list given in this Roman Catholic Directory (handing a Directory to the Witness) is to be considered a correct enumeration of these institutions in Great Britain?—I beg to disclaim any privileged position or confidence with respect to the Roman Catholic body, other than that of being a conveyancer consulted frequently in matters respecting their property, but as one of the ordinary Catholic public, and having neither more nor less than the ordinary knowledge of the subject, I may tell you that I have that book, and that if I wanted to ascertain any matter which fell within it, I should refer to that just as one does to an ordinary Directory.

703. You are aware that the House of Commons has directed this Committee to inquire into certain matters touching conventual and monastic institutions in Great Britain. There is at present, I believe, no recognised list of these institutions except that which I hold in my hand; it is published by Burns and Company, and it is issued "permissu superiorium." Who are the "superiores"?—I really cannot tell you; I very much question whether there are any superiores, who have anything in the world to do with the matter; I should think not.

704. Then the publisher is the only person responsible for this list?—I imagine that is so; so far as I have ever understood, it is a mere private speculation, much such as "Kelly's Post Office Directory" would be; I never heard anything to the contrary.

705. You were speaking of the contemplative orders of the Church of Rome as not being charities where they possessed property?—Yes.

706. The Church of Rome recognises the vocation and occupation of these orders as charities, I conceive?—I am not aware of that.

707. Is it not considered by the Church of Rome that to say masses for the souls of the dead is an act of charity?—I am speaking rather of the contemplative orders of nuns and the contemplative orders of monks; a very large proportion of the latter are not priests; I believe, as a rule, the contemplative orders do not yet ordain priests beyond just that number that is necessary for the spiritual ministrations of the convent.

708. Under the old laws of this country, it was common to found institutions; one portion of their function being to pray and say masses for the souls of the founders and others, and it was considered at that time a charitable purpose, was it not?—I really can hardly tell you, but I believe that the extent to which such foundations were made for the purposes of masses for the dead, or prayers for the dead, has been greatly overrated; I do not think that it formed any leading part of the purposes of such institutions; I believe that the main reason for the existence of such institutions has always been the belief which Roman Catholics entertain, that in the case of very many souls, that particular mode of life is God's vocation, and the mode in which they are to work out their salvation, and that such institutions have been established to enable them to do so; it may not have been uncommon for founders to assume that prayers would be said, and one knows that in the case of All Souls College it was made an express stipulation.

709. That was considered a charitable purpose?—Very probably, but I cannot tell you, because I do not profess to be anything of an antiquarian lawyer.

710. Do not you consider it a charitable purpose to leave property to a certain set of persons that they may perfect themselves in religion?—Certainly not a charity within the meaning of the term as defined by the English law.

711. But it is a term which has not been defined by the English law?—Well, I think that the term "charity," although it has not received any precise and formal definition in the English law, law, has come to be thoroughly well understood as to its main lines of demarcation. I will not say that there may not be cases on the line as to which lawyers may differ; but as to its main features, I think it is thoroughly well understood by English lawyers what is meant by a charity; and I adhere to the opinion which I expressed a day or two ago, that a gift to persons simply for the purpose of perfecting themselves in holiness, and not for the purpose of their taking part in any cure of souls or ministering to the public advantage by way of the promotion or maintenance of religion, is not a charity.

712. But surely, taking the case of an almshouse, where there is provision made for the religious instruction of the inmates, that is a charity?—An almshouse would be a charity in regard of its eleemosynary character, no doubt, and not less a charity because there might happen to be (whether that was usually the case I do not know) provision for the religious instruction of the inmates; probably there would be a clergyman attached to the almshouse, whose duty it would be to read prayers or to say mass, as the case might be, for the inmates; and that would be perfectly within the idea of a charity.

713. But take the case of an institution such as Dulwich, which is not for those who are absolutely destitute; is not that a charity?—I believe that Dulwich is an institution for poor persons, although possibly not for persons absolutely destitute, and it is not a charity except so far as it is for poor persons. I believe that an institution for the residence of rich persons, not being engaged in education, or in the public functions of religion, would be no charity at all, any more than a club would be.

714. Then you hold that these institutions, particularly the convents for women, do not come within the province of the Roman Catholic Charities Act of 1860?—I endeavoured to explain that there would be differences. At the one end of the scale, to take the case of the purely contemplative convent or monastery, I thought it clear that they did not come with that Act. To go to the other end of the scale, and take the case of a convent engaged exclusively and entirely in works of mercy, as for example, sisters of mercy, or a body of priests bound by their rule to devote themselves to preaching and administering the sacraments, those two cases I thought probably might be brought within it. With respect to intermediate circumstances, it is impossible to form an opinion. I endeavoured to lay down what I think the only guiding principle upon the point, that a gift to an institution would or would not be charitable according as you could or could not regard that gift as being a gift for the purposes of the institution, those being charitable.

715. You have mentioned that monasteries and such societies as that of the Jesuits, are distinctly illegal?—All institutions of men bound by vows.

716. Vows are recognised by the law in the case of female institutions, but prohibited with reference to the male institutions?—They are prohibited in the case of the male institutions. I should not say that with respect to the female institutions they are regarded as having any effect whatever; I should therefore not think it accurate to say that they were recognised.

717. They are mentioned in the statute, are they not?—In that sense their existence may be recognised, but they are not recognised by law as amounting to anything.

718. With reference to these monastic male institutions, there appear to be a great variety of them. There are the older ones, the Dominican, the Theatine, and the Franciscan orders, and these are all bound by monastic vows?—As to the Theatines, I know the name, but I do not know anything about them. The Dominicans, and the Franciscans, I believe, speaking by common report, are bound by vows.

719. And so are the Jesuits?—I believe so, speaking in the same way.

720. But the Jesuit society is not considered monastic, but rather a fraternity, or "congregation," I think, was the word he used?—Yes; I hope I am not getting out of my depth, but I have heard as a matter of common information that only the older orders of the year 1200, and before that, are properly and technically orders, and that the members only of those are properly and technically monks; but I am not aware that that is otherwise than a distinction without a difference. I believe this, that the later ones make vows of a character more easily dispensed; that is the practical distinction.

721. Such as the Oratorians?—They make no vows at all of any sort.

722. They are of the order of Saint Philip Neri?—There is no such order.

723. Do you mean that the Oratorians are not an order?—They are called Oratorians; I think that it is called the Oratory of Saint Philip, but it is no order at all.

724. That I think has been decided in our courts?—I have heard that they have been before our courts several times, but I do not think that there was any decision as to their being an order.

725. Do you know the case of Smee v. Knox?—Only by name.

726. You are not aware that the Italian courts have decided that they were an order?—No, I am not.

727. In short, your evidence with respect to the monastic orders, does not give a strict definition of those institutions which should come within the term?—Yes, I should say that a monastic order, properly and fairly understood, consists of men bound by vows. I think that I stated in the very outset of my evidence, that I considered that that was the test of a monastic order.

728. According to the statute of Geo. 4?—Yes; I think that that statute strikes at all orders and congregations of men bound by vows.

729. Chairman.] Whether Protestant or Catholic?—I do not think that at that time the existence of any Protestant ones entered into anybody's mind.

730. Mr. Jessel.] The words of the Act are, "Other religious orders, committees, or societies of the church of Rome"?—Yes; I think it occurred to me before that if the Greek Church were to come over here they might establish their convents with perfect impunity

731. Mr. Newdegate.] Then I understand that you do not include among the monastic orders to which your evidence has reference any society or congregation, or confraternity bound only by discipline and obedience to that discipline?—I do not include any such; I do not know that there is any such, unless you could call the Oratorians such, and their discipline is only voluntary, and at pleasure, I think.

732. The vows, I think, which the law prohibits are voluntary?—Voluntary in the sense that nobody is bound to keep them longer than he chooses excepting as it may affect his soul.

27 May 1870.

733. And yet the law prohibits those vows?—Yes.

734. Chairman.] Is it made penal by any statute to record any vow in an institution of that kind?—In the case of men it is made penal, certainly, by that statute of 10 Geo. 4.

735. Mr. Newdegate.] Under that statute the persons thus designated as belonging to these orders, that is, designated by their having taken certain vows, are subjected to certain conditions, such as registration, if already natives and inhabitants of this country, and admission only by leave of the Secretary of State if they come from abroad; are not those the provisions?—Yes; there are certain provisions for registration which, if I remember right, apply only to monks who were such before 1829, and of course there are very few of those now.

736. And with respect to others, the law says that they shall come to this country only by permission of the Secretary of State?—No doubt.

737. Then the law distinctly recognises monastic vows?—In the same sense as it recognises burglary or anything else plainly illegal. It is hardly right that I should place the two things together, but I wish to point out this, that the law makes the one as illegal as the other, which I consider monstrous.

738. Then the law considers these vows as designating these persons, and also with a view to restraining these institutions, prohibits certain acts on the part of these persons?—Yes; it prohibits them. I cannot make the language clearer.

739. That is the form in restraint of monastic institutions which the law has adopted?—No doubt.

740. You think that there should be no such restraint?—I think that there certainly should be nothing to make it unlawful for a man to follow the dictates of his conscience and take a vow, or a woman either.

741. The law points to these institutions as institutions that it desires to restrain, and marks these institutions by pointing to the vows taken by the members thereof?—Certainly.

742. And it is to this form of restraint that you object?—Not so much to the form of the restraint. I object altogether to the restraint upon persons becoming monks.

743. And becoming possessed of property in this country?—I think that they should have just the same power of acquiring and possessing property as their neighbours, and neither more nor less.

744. You object to any restraints upon the acquisition of monastic or conventual property?—Certainly; I object to any restraints beyond that which the existing laws of the land impose as respects Protestants.

745. That is, you object to the law designating these institutions and the members thereof for the purpose of restraint?—Yes, for the purpose of restraint, but most especially for the purpose of declaring them illegal.

746. But also with respect to the acquisition of property?—Your question, as I understand it, is this: supposing them to be made legal, would I object to any restraints upon their acquisition of property; that is a totally different consideration; but I am not aware of any case being made out why they should not be allowed to possess any amount of property.

747. You are aware that from the time of Magna Charta, and even before, there were restraints enacted by the common law?—I know that in times past they did acquire very large amounts of property; whether that was or was not a proper case for interference, is a question that I do not speak upon.

748. They acquired this property notwithstanding the existence of laws in restraint of such acquisition?—No; I believe that they acquired it in accordance with the then laws.

749. They acquired it although there were laws restraining them in certain particulars?—Whatever those laws were, they no doubt complied with them at that time.

749.* Chairman.] Have you ever known an instance where the penal section of the Act has been enforced?—Not by law, certainly; I have known cases where it has had practical operation. I mentioned one or two instances before, but I do not know any case in which it has ever been enforced by any tribunal.

750. But do not you know of many cases where it is totally disregarded?—I have an impression, in common with a good many other people, that there are a good many monks in this country, but I really do not know it of my own knowledge in the case of any one of them.

751. Mr. Newdegate.] Are you aware that the monks of Mount St. Bernard, in Leicestershire, are possessed of property?—I believe they are; I know a lithograph which represents the convent there, and I have heard that they did buy a stony arid piece of land on Mount St. Bernard, and that they have cultivated that tract of land, and made it available for useful purposes.

752. Are you aware that part of that is leased to a reformatory school, which is supported partly by the State?—There is a reformatory there; and, speaking of it as a matter of common rumour, I believe that it was connected with the monks for a certain time, and is so no longer.

753. But are you aware that there is a lease from the monks of the land which is attached to that reformatory school?—No, I am not.

754. Are you not aware that monastic institutions, associations of men for the purpose of monastic life, do possess property in this country?—I do not possess any accurate and complete information, but so far as I know, the property of the monks is limited to their churches and convents, with the exception of a comparatively small amount of property, as to which I really cannot give you the amount particularly.

755. Are you aware that convents of women do possess property?—No doubt they do; they bring in dowries of 1,000 l., or something like that, when they go in; of course they possess property.

756. And any property accruing to them after profession, would go to the community?—Oh, no; a nun would be perfectly free to deal with the property that came to her after profession, as she pleased.

757. That is, if she disregarded the vow of poverty?—They would not let her live in the convent, and spend her money as a lady of fashion; I have no doubt of that.

758. In fact, they would apply the property for her?—I do not think that they would apply the property for her; they would not let her keep it for her own personal use, and be a nun in their their convent; they would all have to live together in a certain frugal way, and if any one of them becoming possessed of property were to attempt to spend it on her personal luxuries, no doubt it would not be allowed; beyond that, I cannot tell you.

759. Nor would she be allowed to devote to any purpose of her own choice?—I do not know that they would interfere as respects the capital of it; I do not believe that they would allow her to spend the income.

760. Chairman.] If she dies without disposing of it, they have no title to it?—No; if she dies without disposing of it, it will go, according to the ordinary law of the land, to the heir or the next of kin. If she had made a will, it would go as the will directed.

761. Mr. Newdegate.] If she had made a will before the acquisition of this property, what then?—Before or after, it makes no difference.

762. But supposing a case of property accruing subsequent to her profession, and she had made no will?—If real estate, it would go to her heir, if personal estate, to her next of kin.

763. Would you recommend an alteration of the law by which it would be legal for such a nun to leave this property to which you have adverted, to the community in which she lived?—I would recommend that the law should render the community in which she lives not illegal, and beyond that I would leave the law exactly as it stands.

764. And if the community was not illegal, the property would go to the community, if the nun becoming possessed of it so chose?—If she chose to leave it to a community made legal, in a way that was legal (and it would be a matter that would require some conveyancing skill to do that), I would certainly not interfere by law to prevent her. Of course if she did so, all the existing law which would strike at any will, made under undue influence, or the like, would remain; but if she, as a free agent, made a legal will in favour of a legal institution, I cannot see why the law should interfere.

765. You would render the community capable of receiving that property?—I would not interfere to render it capable of receiving that property further than would be done by sweeping away any law which rendered it an illegal community; I would place it on the same level as any club.

766. Mr. Jessel.] Or as any community of Protestants?—Yes.

767. Mr. Newdegate.] Then, practically, you would leave these communities free as though they were not connected with the Roman Catholic Church or system?—Exactly.

768. Mr. Bourke.] Are you aware of any monastic or conventual establishments in England that would, by their constitution, come under the cognisance of the Charity Commissioners?—I am not sufficiently aware of their constitutions to be able to answer that. There are some which I know are so completely dedicated to the charitable works, that I can conceive that so far as their purposes were concerned they might. But you must bear in mind that the Charity Commissioners have no jurisdiction over property collected by way of subscriptions; and I conceive that if a body of ladies bring their own property into a common fund, and chose to apply it to charitable purposes, it would not bring them within the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners quoad that property.

769. But supposing property was left to any monastic or conventual establishment that you know of in England, do you know of any such establishment that would by that gift be brought under the cognisance of the Charity Commissioners?—I think that there are several that would be brought under the cognisance of the Charity Commissioners quoad that property so left.

770. Mr. Gregory.] I am not sure that I quite understood how far you meant to go with respect to legalising vows. You talked of legalising a vow against marriage, that is to say, allowing a lady to enter into a vow that she will not contract marriage in her lifetime?—I went no further than this: that the making of such a vow should not be an illegal act, but I would continue to keep it an act perfectly devoid of legal effect.

771. So as not to interfere with the law as to contracts in restraint of marriage?—I would not in the slightest interfere with that law, but it should not be an illegal act.

772. As to contemplative orders, will you enlighten me, in my ignorance; I do not rightly understand that those orders have no external duties beyond the walls of their establishment?—There are some that have none.

773. Strictly none?—Strictly none; they are bound by the law of inclosure, as it is called; that is to say, they do not go outside their doors or let any man in, except in cases of sickness.

774. Do not they take children in for the purposes of education?—There are some that do nothing of that kind, I believe; those cases are rare but there are some of them.

775. They are contemplative orders still, though contemplative orders which are mixed up with external functions?—Yes, there are some of a mixed character, and some almost wholly active.

776. Partly mercy and partly education, you may say?—Yes.

777. Mr. Talbot] Are there any such purely contemplative institutions in England?—I have heard of one, at least.

778. With reference to the position of monks, you agree, I think, that a monk vi termini, merely by being a monk, is subject to the law?—Yes; I think, vi termini, a monk is a person bound by vows, and if so he is within the laws and illegal.

779. Then we may take it that it is merely by the mercy of the public that every monk is not proceeded against?—I think so; it may be partly from the difficulty of proving it in a criminal court.

780. If anybody liked to interfere, any monk might be proceeded against?—Yes.

781. With reference to the convents, does your definition of a convent imply a place in which perpetual vows are taken?—Not perpetual vows.

782. Vows of any sort?—I made that distinction, because I believe that there are certain communities in which the vows are taken for terms of years, or for a year, but I think I may say that, as I understand a convent, it is a place where vows are made and kept.

783. You would not consider an establishment in which persons lived together for religious purposes or charitable purposes, without taking vows, to be a conventual establishment?—No, I should not.

784. As regards the doctrine of superstitious uses, is it possible to say in a sentence what that covers, or is it too long to go into?—I am not aware that there is anything which would now be regarded as a superstitious use, excepting the masses for the dead, or prayers for the dead. I think that, as the law now stands, trusts for masses for the dead or prayers for the dead would be regarded as superstitious.

27 May 1870.

785. You put the two on the same footing?—Yes.

786. Mr. O'Reilly.] A good many questions have been put as to whether as a matter of fact most convents in England would come under the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners; now I want to call your attention to one point; in the case of many convents of women in England, the property is the property of all the members jointly, and they may dispose of it as they like by joint consent; for instance, having a house or a school in London, they may sell it and purchase another house elsewhere, and go and live there, and teach a similar or a different school there; would it be possible to bring property given to such an institution as that under the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners, where there is no obligation attached to any place?—Certainly not; although the purposes of the institution were charitable purposes, the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners would attach so far only as the property was given or left by way of charity for those purposes, and the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners certainly would not affect their own property over which they had still reserved the ownership, nor would it affect mere subscriptions.

787. The property of most of the convents being, however, derived from the property of the members who, as I say, may be moving about from one place to another, under no obligation of place, although they devote that property wherever they are to charitable purposes, would not that render it impossible for the Charity Commissioners to have jurisdiction as respects that property?—Yes; and from my experience even the active and charitable orders have avoided as a rule settling their property, so as to subject it to any charitable trust, and they have reserved the absolute ownership of it, and my experience is, that they sell it from time to time, and not uncommonly.

788. Chairman.] Do we rightly understand that there is no declaration of trust at all?—I think that generally speaking there is no declaration of trust at all.

789. But property is conveyed to them in their names as individuals?—Invariably.

790. And you say that there is no recognition of any trust or obligation on their part in its administration?—I believe that you would not find any written declaration of trust in any case, I might say.

791. But is it not usual to make the conveyance of the legal estate to some person not immediately connected with the monastery, but where the trust is either for a religious purpose, or for the monastery itself?—I think that the usual practice is to select some three or more members of the institution itself, and to convey to them without any declaration of trust whatever.

792. But you have never heard of the people who had the legal estate not knowing what the trusts of that estate were?—No, excepting that by accident the legal estate might descend upon the heir of a surviving grantee.

793. But it is not usual to make the conveyance to some person not connected with the monastery, who presumes that the trust is for some pious purpose, and leaves its administration to some other, who he assumes will act faithfully, and does not inquire into it himself?—No; I think that the thing has been done in the loosest possible way. When they have bought their property they have selected three or four names, the youngest of the community, perhaps, and caused it to be conveyed to those persons.

794. Supposing that there has been a bequest to so many persons by name to take the property in joint tenancy, but that these persons are monks and live in the monastery; would that be void from the mere circumstance that these persons were monks?—No, it is thus: if it was a devise to three gentlemen by name, being monks, and it could not be shown that the testator in his lifetime had communicated to them any intention or expectation of his as to the purposes to which they would apply the property, then in law they would be absolute legal and beneficial owners; but, on the other hand, it is well settled that if the testator communicates to the devisee or legatee of the property his intentions as to the application of the property, whether for any charitable purpose or for any other purpose, that devisee cannot take beneficially, but he takes as a trustee, for those purposes, if legal; or, if those purposes be illegal, then the heir-at-law or next of the kin is let in.

795. Does it ever arise that the devisee, or the persons profiting by the trust, are compelled to declare what they know of the trust?—Yes; I know several instances of cases in which Bills have been filed against devisees to put them to their oath as to whether in the testator's lifetime he communicated to them what he wanted them to do with the property.

796. Do they consider that they are bound to disclose under those circumstances?—Undoubtedly they would be bound to disclose; they would be put to their oath, and have to put in an answer in Chancery stating the circumstances.

797. Have there not been instances where they have refused to disclose?—I do not know of any such. If there were any such, the parties were undoubtedly attached for contempt of Court.

798. If the bequest were made to persons by name as joint tenants, they would pay the duty as strangers, would they not?—If they were strangers in blood they would pay the 10 per cent., certainly.

799. If one of the joint tenants died (not in the testator's lifetime, but after this property is in possession by the tenants), and another is named in his place, the duty usually is paid upon a succession of that kind?—If one of the (say) three joint tenants dies, there is a duty payable by the two survivors, undoubtedly.

800. They are seised of the whole?—They would become by survivorship seised of the whole.

801. But the practice is always to keep the trust alive, is it not?—You mean it is to take anybody out of the deeds who is likely to die; very likely that is the practice, but they cannot always calculate upon that.

802. The State loses the succession duty in that case?—Undoubtedly; if they can contrive it, there does not take place a death of a person who is owner of the property, and then the law has no right to any succession duty. I am speaking, of course, of the beneficial interest; the beneficial interest is the thing that is taxable, and the tax accrues accrues when a transmission of interest occurs by death.

803. Mr. Matthews.] In the case put to you by the Chairman, the State ought not to get succession duty, ought it?—I understood the Chairman to start with a case in which there was a devise to persons without any trust.

804. Mr. Cogan.] It is the same in any other case of joint tenancy?—Yes; I am simply stating the ordinary law of joint tenancy.

805. Mr. Matthews.] In point of fact, in that case there are no trusts; the benefit enjoyed by the community is simply by one, however?—If you have an absolute bequest to those three persons, they are in law and in equity absolute owners of that property, assuming that there has been no communication to them in the life of the testator of any intention on his part.

806. About vows; there is nothing, is there, to prevent a Protestant at this moment in England from taking a vow to live in poverty and to live in chastity, or to live in obedience to a superior?—Nothing that I know of; but I think that they would all go for nothing.

807. So far as any personal obligations should be sought to be founded on a law of that sort, the law of England would not enforce them, you mean?—It would ignore them altogether.

808. But supposing that a contract respecting property and the enjoyment of property be coupled with vows of that kind, the law of England would not fail to enforce that contract simply because it had been accompanied by such vows?—If I understand the question, it would not.

809. If a man, at the time that he took a vow of poverty, chastity, and obedience, agreed to pay a sum of money down to the institution on condition of being permitted to live there, so far as that was a contract of the one to pay the money, and of the other that he should live there, the law of England would not refuse to enforce that part of the contract?—No.

810. You are content that Roman Catholic vows should be treated in the same way?—Yes.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE CHARLES PELHAM VILLIERS, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JAMES VINCENT HARTING, called in; and Examined.

31 May 1870.

811. Mr. Matthews.] YOU have been, I believe, many years in practice as a Solicitor?—I have.

812. And you have been largely concerned as a solicitor for various convents in England?—I have.

813. I will not take you through the whole law that we have travelled through already; have you heard the opinions that have been expressed to the Committee as to the doubtful legality of convents, and the illegality of monasteries?—Yes, I have. I believe convents, in the true construction of law, to be equally illegal with monasteries, and I have always acted upon that opinion.

814. The honourable Member for Dover asked, at our last meeting, whether there was any decision upon that subject: have you made yourself acquainted with the arguments in the Queen's Bench, in the case of Saurin and Starr?—I have, so far as Mr. Mellish's arguments went, which is the only part of the case that I know anything about.

815. Was it there contended that the effect of the 17th section of the 31 Geo. 3, c. 32, was to leave convents illegal?—It was.

816. And did the Court of Queen's Bench grant a rule to show cause upon that point?—It appears in the shorthand writer's notes that it did.

817. That case, I believe, was settled, and cause was never shown against the rule?—Of that I know nothing.

818. You may be aware that the cause was compromised?—It was popularly said to be compromised.

819. So that no decision was ever got beyond granting the rule on that point?—So I am informed.

820. Do you know any other recent authority on the illegality of convents?—I think there has been no recent authority on that subject; the only instance in which, so far as I know, the case arose was in a discussion in the House of Lords. In the year 1800 a Bill was introduced and passed through the House of Commons, to prevent the extension of foreign convents. At the time of the French Revolution, it was considered that the number of emigrants, clergy, and others, had become so numerous, and the houses growing up were so many, that all the mischiefs sought to be restrained by the earlier penal Statutes would arise again. A Bill was therefore introduced into the House of Commons, which was passed in a house of 76 only; 52 voted for the Bill and 24 against it. The Bill was sent up to the Lords on the 10th of July, in the year 1800, and it was opposed by the Bishop of St. David's (Dr. Samuel Horsley) and supported by the Bishop of Winchester. Dr. Horsley's speech was an able one, and a very conciliatory one. He argued against the mischiefs sought to be restrained, and he attempted to show that the existing laws (for two Acts had then been passed for the relief of Catholics) guarded against all the mischiefs which were then sought to be restrained. But a great deal had been said in the House of Commons upon the subject of professions; it was said that, in one of the convents mentioned, some professions had taken place, particularly of two ladies named. Dr. Horsley appears to have informed himself upon the subject, and to have been willing to communicate that information to the House of Lords; and he began by giving their Lordships their names and description, and showing that the novitiate which had been completed in England had been commenced in a foreign house, and that, therefore, it was not open to anything that had been said about it in the House of Commons, and he was going into further details, when the Lord Chancellor, Lord Loughborough, stopped him. He said that it was very improper to enter into any such matters; that the thing was certainly a high offence and whatever might be said in extenuation could not relieve the parties from the severe penalties which no doubt had been incurred, and that it was, therefore, improper to give any details about them. The Bill was thrown out.

821. That opinion was expressed by Lord Loughborough, sitting as Chancellor?—Yes.

822. The penalties of the Emancipation Act against men are something superadded to the then then existing statutory law?—I have always thought so.

823. What are the Acts upon which, in your judgment, the legality of convents must be determined? — Curiously enough, until the 1 Geo. 1, st. 2, c. 50, there is only one Act, I believe, throughout the whole penal code, in which the word "nunnery" or the word "monk" occurs.

824. What Act is that?—That is the Act of the 3 Chas. 1, c. 2, which is an Act to restrain sending children abroad for education, or contributing to support monasteries or nunneries, or monks and friars; in fact, there is an especial mention of things there which does not occur in any other previous Act.

825. That Act is repealed?—Yes, by the 7 and 8 Vict. c. 102.

826. What are the subsisting Acts from which you would infer the illegality of convents?—I cite that Act as showing that convents were within the intendment of the earlier Statutes, and also, because that Act was not repealed until 1844, and was not repealed, therefore, at the time that the Act of 10 Geo. 4 was passed.

827. But I wish you to state to the Committee what are the enactments from which you infer that the illegality of convents now subsists?—The words used in the former Acts are "Religious persons;" there is no distinction of sex in any of them, nor any reference to sex, except in that one single Act to which I have referred, excepting in the saving clause in the 10 Geo. 4; therefore all that would make religious orders of men illegal would equally make illegal all institutions of religious women.

828. But I do not understand that there are any statutory enactments left now unrepealed which render convents or monasteries illegal except the clauses of the Emancipation Act?—If you refer to the three Relief Acts which were precedent to the Emancipation Act, you will find (and it is a curious fact) that with the exception of portions of sections of an Act of 1 William 3, there is no act repealed whatever; all those Statutes stand down to the years 1844 and 1846, that is to say down to 7th & 8th of the Queen, and the 9th & 10th of the Queen. Down to that period there was no repeal of any Act whatever, except portions of sections of 1 William 3; so that all those Acts remain, and the Act of 31 Geo. 3, and the Act of 18 Geo. 3, merely relieve upon terms, and do not relieve unconditionally. There is only one clause in that latter Act which is a healing clause, the second section of 18 Geo. 3; no doubt, referring to those acts providing for the registration of popish estates, and that no estate should pass by any popish deed, which deed was not enrolled within six months from the date of its execution.

829. But since the 7th & 8th of the Queen, and the 9th & 10th of the Queen, what is it, in your view, that renders convents illegal?—I do not think that those statutes touch the question at all; they merely touch penalties; they do not repeal the Acts in toto, but only portions of them; and, oddly enough, some of those portions which are said to be repealed by those Acts have been repealed by former Statutes, and in places where you would hardly look for them.

830. That is your view; that those repealing Acts of the present reign repeal penalties only, but do not modify the illegalities which are the result of the former Acts?—I say that, to a great extent, that is so. Some Acts were repealed altogether; other Acts were repealed partially.

831. At any rate, the 17th section of the 31st of Geo. 3, c. 32, has never been repealed?—It has never been repealed, and is still law.

832. And, in your view, is the effect of that section to leave it at least in doubt whether convents do not remain illegal?—Since I understood the subject, or thought that I understood the subject, I never felt any doubt about that.

833. Has there been a change in the character of the religious orders, since those penal Statutes were passed?—A very great change.

834. At the time of the penal Statutes there were a great number of Contemplative Orders, were there not? —Yes.

835. And at the time of the first penal Statutes the effect of all solemn vows was civil death and the loss of civil rights?—That was their effect.

836. Those effects no longer follow now, do they, from any vow take non religious profession? —None of them.

837. So that at the present time, in England, there is no such thing as a solemn vow as it was understood in the days of the penal Statutes?—So far as I have been able to inform myself on the subject, there is no such thing in England as a solemn vow within the meaning of these Statutes.

838. Have the Contemplative Orders decreased in this country?—In that speech of the Bishop of St. David's, to which I was referring just now, he gives the House of Lords some information, and quotes some statistics in reference to the state of Catholic establishments at that time in the kingdom; and he tells them that there were 22 houses of religious women then in England, of which four were French, eighteen only being English; that is to say, they were emigrant convents that had come in from abroad, English religious women previously to that time having had no home here, nor the means of a home here, by reason of the penal Statutes. Now of those 18, three have been absorbed into another house, and one at least, if not more, has become extinct.

839. There were four foreign houses, you say, at that time?—Yes; and they returned to France, I believe, after the Revolution; I am speaking now only of English convents.

840. To your knowledge, have there been any fresh Contemplative Orders in England since that date?—There is only one instance of that, and that is an affiliation of an existing house. I do not mean to say that there have not been convents introduced here from abroad, foreign members or ladies professed abroad who have come here, but they are not Contemplative Orders; they are not what our houses were before the Reformation, and what they were at the time which we are just now speaking of; that is to say, the time when the penal laws were passed.

841. And with regard; to the remaining 200 and odd houses that exist in England, are the residents composed of active orders?—I should think that four-fifths of them are active orders. A great number of them, though called convents, in truth are not convents; a priest, for instance, has a poor school; if the mission is poor, he cannot afford to pay a salaried teacher or mistress; he can get it cheaper done by these ladies, who are much better qualified for that work, and who do it for nothing; he gets two or three of them, and that is immediately introduced into our Directory as a convent, but it is in truth no convent.

842. Is the result of this change in the character of the vows and of the religious orders of women in England, that there is no longer the same conflict between the law of the Church and the law of England that used formerly to exist?—There is none. Before the Reformation there was no conflict; there was a comity between the law of the State and the law of the Church which was perfectly well understood; but, of course, at the breach with Rome when there was a change in religion, the whole thing was altered, and the State ceased to wait on the Church as it had done before.

843. Does it appear to you that the reasons for the former jealousy against convents and monastic establishments no longer exist?—I think it is impossible to read the old Statutes without seeing that they were directed against foreign interference in any way whatever. The clergy who were prohibited from returning here, the religious orders that were prohibited from returning here, were not the home-bred clergy, not the Marian clergy who remained in Elizabeth's time; but they were Jesuits, seminary priests, and "like disobedient persons" (that is the description in the Act) coming from beyond seas.

844. All those reasons for prohibition no longer exist now?—They have all ceased now; we have no foreign education now; happily, it is all conducted here at home, and the State must have derived infinite advantage from that.

845. Coming now to the Act of 1860, I will not take you through the reasons again, but do you concur in the opinion that has been expressed to the Committee, that convents and monasteries, speaking generally, are not charities per se?—They are not charities, because there is no endowment.

846. Independently of that, would an endowment for the benefit of a convent or monastery, simpliciter, be in your view a charity?—It would depend upon the form of the gift; I know of none such as you have indicated, and therefore I cannot speak with reference to that.

847. Do you know, from your own professional practice and experience, what was done under the Act of 1860 by the Roman Catholics?—Yes, I know largely; for I was occupied for many months in examining a great number of deeds and in revising others for persons who consulted me upon the point, as to what deeds should or should not be enrolled.

848. And did you, after the Act of 1860, cause to be enrolled all such deeds as, in your judgment were charities?—I enrolled all deeds, and I advised to be enrolled, if they were not in my hands, all deeds that came within the Act. An exception was taken here the other day, which I heard with amazement, that the deeds enrolled were deeds conveying the legal estate only, and not deeds declaring a trust.

849. Will you explain that?—It is perfectly clear, as it seems to me, that the only deeds required to be enrolled by 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, are the deeds by which the legal estate passed, or by which the money, if it were not money in the funds, passed, or those other interests which were to be the subject-matters of the deed; the State did not concern itself about trusts; it only wanted to know what amount of property was to be dedicated to these purposes, and having once got that information, it could put its hand upon that property at any moment; I mean purposes in mortmain, or objects tending to mortmain. It knew exactly where the property lay, and that was all it cared about. As for the particular trust, there was no protection in that, because anything might have been enrolled as the trust, and the particulars which the State desired to acquire might never have been communicated, or might have been only imperfectly communicated, and therefore all that that Act required was the enrolment of the deed by which the legal or other estate passed, and that, as I take it, is settled law. It has been settled affirmatively, and it has been settled negatively. It was settled affirmatively in the case of Doe & Lloyd, which you will find in 1st Manning & Grainger, page 671; and it was settled negatively in another case, that of Doe & Waterton, which you will find in 3rd Barnwell & Alderson, page 149. In the first case that I have mentioned, as reported in Manning & Grainger, there were several objections. One was, that the enrolment was not proved, that amounted to nothing. The deed was a Methodist deed relating to some Wesleyan property. Now this occurred in 1840: but in 1832 that connection, in order to save expense and trouble to their charities, had framed a model deed which was enrolled, and, as I understand from communication with members of that body, has been in use ever since. Therefore, it was only necessary, in taking a conveyance for any land required for their purposes to make reference to the model deed. Then it was objected on this occasion that the reference to the model deed was no declaration of trust, and that without a declaration of trust the enrolment would be void; that it availed nothing, inasmuch as the Act of Geo. 2 required the enrolment of a deed of trust and not of a deed conveying the legal estate. But the Court held expressly in that case, that the reference to the model deed was surplusage; that all that the law cared about was the enrolment of the deed itself, by which the legal estate passed. Then in the next case, which was a copyhold case, the negative of that arose. There it was attempted to supply the defect of the deed by which the estate passed, not being a deed indented, and so forth according to the requirements of the Act of Geo. 2, by showing that upon the same day a declaration of trust had been executed, and had been enrolled. The Court said, "That is nothing to the purpose; there is no law requiring the enrolment of a declaration of trust; the gift is void; it is not in the form of the Statute."

850. On the part of the Charity Commissioners, has any objection ever been made to you, that the declaration of trust of these deeds which you enrolled for Catholic charities has not also been enrolled?—When I have been at the office, it sometimes has. I have told them always that I have done all that the law required.

851. Has that explanation been accepted by the Charity Commissioners?—There was an Act passed of the 24th of the Queen, chapter 9, I think, which now provides that the declaration of trust shall be enrolled, and not the conveyance where there are two deeds, and that the enrolment of the declaration of trust shall secure the same protection to the charity which the enrolment of the deed in the terms required by the Act of Geo. 2 would have done, if still observed.

852. I presume that in many of those cases of enrolment just after the Act 1860, there were no express deeds declaring the trusts, but that the e trusts were derived only from usage?—You e we had no protection as the law then stood, d therefore, as a rule, there were no trusts atever.

853. You did enrol in all those cases all that u could?—I enrolled everything that I found have been acquired at any time subsequent to ly 1828, for that is a most material point hich was omitted to be noticed the other day, cause in that year you will remember an Act Parliament was passed, 9 Geo. 4, c. 85, d known as Duval's Act, curing defects of le arising from want of enrolment. There ere a great number of Dissenting charities in e same position as ourselves; under the penal tatutes directed against the Dissenters, all places worship and schools were in a precarious ate, and they did not enrol their deeds; and the me mischief had arisen, so the Act recites, in re- rd to Protestant charities. That Act of 1828 als the defect as to all deeds for valuable nsideration up to that time without re- iring them to be enrolled. Then when our ct of the 23rd & 24th of the Queen, the ct of 1860, came, I suggested at once to ose who had the conduct of the matter, "You ust give us, at least, the same protection which rotestants and Dissenters have had, and put s all on the same footing; the expense will be ery great in our case, even for subsequent deeds; ou relieve them from the necessity of enrolling eir deeds not enrolled prior to the Act of the 9 f Geo. 4; give us the same protection;" and you ill find that there is a clause added in the Act f 1860, giving us the same protection. So that only looked, in the first place, at the date, and nything before that date was put aside; and s the largest class of our deeds are before that eriod, that may account for the numbers that eem to surprise Mr. Erle or the Charity Com- issioners. I enrolled within three months 255 eeds out of my own office; and I paid 586 l. for he enrolment; so you may judge what the cost ould have been if an enforced enrolment had xtended to all our deeds.

854. Mr. Newdegate.] In what year did you o that?—In 1861, I think; you must consider he time that all those deeds took to examine.

855. Mr. Matthews.] Has there been any esitation, as far as your professional knowledge nables you to speak, in acting under the Charity Commissioners, and in enrolling deeds of Catholic harities?—Not the slightest.

856. Whenever there has been a deed relating o a charity proper, has it always been enrolled o far as you know?—Yes, so far as I know, lways; and so far as having recourse to the Com- issioners goes, I know that when occasion has risen, I have always gone there and have found very courtesy and assistance. One of the most ntricate cases they have had in the office I be- eve, I gave them.

857. Do any of these deeds that have been nrolled, either in 1861 or since, relate to pro- erty enjoyed by either convents or monasteries? -Not directly.

858. Do you mean that there are some of them hat relate to schools or institutions of that kind hich are managed by persons belonging to onastic orders?—That is what I mean.

859. Supposing an endowment to be provided or a school, that would be a charity, and a legal harity?—Yes.

860. And it would not the less be a legal charity because it happened to be superintended by monks or nuns?—Management would not touch, of course, the validity of the trust.

861. Therefore it would not be an illegal charity on that account?—No; because the charity is created irrespective of the persons who have the management.

862. But if there is a trust expressly for the benefit of monks or nuns, in your view, is that an illegal trust, although those monks or nuns do happen to devote themselves to educational or other charitable purposes?—My opinion is, that if the deed of a school had coupled with it a clause imposing the condition of the management of it for all time by a religious order, that trust would be void.

863. I put to you the case of a deed in trust for the benefit of monks or nuns who happened to devote themselves to educational or other charitable purposes?—If there happens to be such a deed, I believe it to be void.

864. Mr. Jessel.] Have you enrolled any such deed?—Certainly not.

865. Mr. Matthews.] If any such deed existed, you would, of course, avoid enrolling it as a matter of duty to your clients?—Yes.

866. But, so far as you are aware, you know of no such deed?—It is not the practice at all; the state of the law does not admit of it; people will not invite risks of litigation in the management of their property.

867. As far as your practice goes, how is the property that is enjoyed by convents held?—It is held by individuals, purchased by individuals, and held by them as their own absolutely.

868. Chairman.] You said "purchased;" do you mean that it could be acquired in that way?—That is the only way in which it can be acquired, so far as we know.

869. It could be acquired by gift, could it not?—It could be acquired by gift; but those gifts do not exist.

870. Mr. Matthews.] You do not know any instance of such a gift?—I have prepared a great number of deeds, and I never saw any such deed.

871. However acquired, whether by purchase or gift (which latter, we hope, may occur hereafter), you say that the property is vested in individuals absolutely?—Absolutely.

872. Without any declaration of trust?—Without any declaration of trust, in joint tenancy.

873. Then is the title continued in the way in which every other joint tenancy would be?—Yes; not necessarily keeping up any number, because that is discretionary with those in whom the property is vested; they do as they like.

874. They put in fresh names from time to time, as occasion arises?—Sometimes it is done at the instance of persons who may want to retire. There is no obligation of any sort or kind to keep up the number; they are perfectly free.

875. In practice, that is the way in which it is done; that fresh names are put in?—Yes.

876. In so far as the community enjoys the benefit of such property, is that enjoyment dependent merely upon the pleasure and honour of the owners?—Merely upon the honour of the owners.

877. Are the owners free in law to do what they please with that property; can they sell it or dispose of it?—I take it that neither at law nor in equity could anything be enforced against them contrary to their own will and pleasure.

878. Of course that property would be liable to their their creditors in the event of bankruptcy?—I apprehend that it would.

879. And if not, at death it passes to their heirs, next of kin, or devises, as the case may be?—In the case of joint tenancy, if there was no surviving joint tenant and no will, it would of course pass as to real estate to the heir, and as to personal estate to the legal personal representatives.

880. And on the death of one of several joint tenants, it survives to the others?—Yes.

881. And are the duties paid corresponding to those different transmissions of property?—When those occasions arise, they are.

882. You have, I believe, prepared yourself to give evidence to the Committee as to the property which is actually held by existing convents in England, or members of convents in England?—I do not propose to enter upon any detail, but in the aggregate, speaking generally of the convents as a body, and not of individual cases. I have informed myself with great pains upon the state of their property both real and personal, and the result generally, I am prepared to communicate to the Committee. The Committee will forgive me for saying that I do not intend, in answer to any question, to enter upon details.

883. You represent professionally, I believe, 200 convents or more?—Yes, for this purpose, I do, with my friend, Mr. Arnold; he and I together have been charged to represent not only our own clients, but the ladies of other convents have requested us to do the same for them; we act for them in all these matters as their solicitors.

884. Having information about the state and condition of the property enjoyed by members of all those communities, you are prepared to state the aggregate results to the Committee?—I am; but I will not give any data by which any algebraic or other formula can be formed to arrive at what I do not want to give.

885. We will take it in the shape in which you will give it; I think, I understand you to say, that it is about 200 convents that you represent?—Yes; in fact, I represent more than those, because I have been honoured by instructions from the Scotch convents, and I represent them also here, this inquiry having been extended to Great Britain.

886. How many do you represent in all on this occasion?—About 215; a little over 200 in England, and the balance in Scotland.

887. Can you tell us the number of inmates in all those convents?—If I tell you the number of inmates, and give you any other like information, I give you a result which I do not mean to give. I have ascertained what the whole personal property of the convents is, and what their real property is.

888. I am not asking you as to the number of any particular convent, but the number of inmates in all those convents?—If the inquiry stopped there, and no further inquiry is made as to the amount of property, either real or personal, there is no difficulty in stating it.

889. Have you the aggregate amount of property, real and personal, held for their benefit?—Yes, I know it.

890. Will you state it?—I cannot state that; but with your permission I will give it in another form. As to real estate, each nun would be entitled to two roods and 34 perches of land, with a small decimal.

891. Is that property that is held in fee, or is some of it leasehold?—All leaseholds above 60 years I have treated as freehold; it is only a small quantity that is long leasehold, but I have treated that as substantially freehold for the purposes of this inquiry.

892. Is that any more in the aggregate than is required for the occupation of the different communities?—No; and that includes the gardens and courtyards, and site of the house.

893. Do you know of any case in which a community of nuns enjoy the benefit of land which they have let to others?—Very few of them have land to let.

894. Then this amount of land that you have stated is land which, in point of fact, they required for their own occupation, for residences and gardens?—Yes, with one exception (and that is an exception that was forced upon them from the necessity of their position, where they have been obliged to buy land that they did not want, in order to protect themselves from encroachments on one side), there is not much land let, but the whole for the most part is in the hands of the occupants.

895. In point of fact, the land is all residential?—It is all residential, or very little beyond that. The exceptions are scarcely noticeable, and then only from circumstances such as I have mentioned.

896. Have you known from time to time cases of sales of a house or land the benefit of which was enjoyed by a convent?—If you mean cases where religious women were the occupants, I have known such, and I have been concerned in them. I wish to be accurate, and therefore I will state that the proportions which I am now giving relate to England only. The laws of England and Scotland, as you are aware, are perfectly distinct in reference to the dedication of land for these purposes; therefore I am speaking now of England.

897. Have you anything to add in your own way upon the subject of the land which is enjoyed or occupied by these religious women?—I have only this to say, that having arrived by a very careful computation at this result, I find that they occupy only about one-third of the estimated quantity per head with reference to the population and the corrected acreage of the kingdom.

898. Will you make that a little more intelligible to the Committee?—The corrected acreage of England and Wales I find to be 37,321,323 acres, and the population at the last census was only 20,063,793. Now if you divide the one by the other you will find that that gives rather more than an acre and three-quarters to each inhabitant, and we have only got two roods and 34 perches; we have not got a third, therefore, of what we are entitled to represent.

899. What statement have you to make as to the personal property enjoyed, I will say, by communities of this sort, or belonging to members of such communities?—I find by an equally careful computation that if they were to take in severalty they would each receive 6 l. 13 s. 3 d. per head per annum.

900. Reckoned at how much per cent.?—I have taken the nominal capital; I thought that the fairest way; instead of ascertaining the value of the different securities held, I have taken the nominal capital in every case, and computed the interest at 4 per cent.; I do not think that that any objection can be taken to that, and that is the result.

901. I asked you before, whether you have known instances of lands belonging to the members of communities, having been sold and diverted from the purposes of those communities? — I have; and I was going to mention also, that so far from there being any perpetuity, every one of the 18 convents referred to have changed their residence, within my personal knowledge, three, and sometimes four times; I am speaking of the 18 convents mentioned by Dr. Horsley, in his speech in 1800.

902. Now you have told us about the resources of these ladies; will you give us some idea of the way in which they employ their time; are they not engaged in educational work? — Yes, largely in education; in the education of the upper classes, of the middle classes, and of the poor, and in the care of orphan children, charging themselves with prison children, children from workhouses, the reclamation of penitent women, and otherwise. The results from the whole kingdom, I think, I can give you; and that there may be no mistake, I have not trusted to my memory, but have put them on paper. I find from very careful examination of the books kept, that in England and Wales these ladies educate, of the upper class, 990 young ladies; of the middle class, 3,115; of the poor, 56,612; and of Sunday scholars, 4,604; making a total of 65,321 children.

903. When you speak of the poor, may I take it that that education is given gratuitously?—Gratuitously; I find also that in England and Wales, 379 penitent women, who had been reclaimed, are housed and provided for.

904. Mr. Pease.] Are you now speaking of one year?—These are now actual occupants of refuges; the number has been sometimes larger, and sometimes smaller. In Scotland of the upper class there are 34 young ladies in the convents; of the middle class there are 377, and of the poor there are 3,299, making a total of 3,710.

905. There again, are the poor children gratuitously educated?—Yes; and of penitent women, 102 are now in refuges in Scotland.

906. Can you give us the figures showing the amount of relief given to the sick or to the poor?—That I endeavoured to ascertain, but it is difficult to estimate, because it is given in so many forms; it is given in clothes, it is given in food, it is given in medicine, it is given by occasional lodging, where there is the convenience for receiving them into the houses; so that it would be impossible to make any estimate at all of the amount given, but it must be very large. Then, besides, there are the sick, visited by hundreds and thousands, visited at their own houses and relieved.

907. Mr. O'Reilly.] Will you add the number in hospitals?—I have not taken the inmates of the hospitals; I have considered those to be rather in the nature of charities, and not to come within the purview of this inquiry.

908. Mr. Matthews.] You have said already that the property as a rule is vested in individuals without any trusts; I want to know in what way a person entering into one of these communities habitually arranges his or her worldly affairs before profession?—If she has property it is generally expected that she brings a certain sum with her, as a contribution towards her support while a member of the community, and those sums vary very much; they vary not only in different convents, but they vary even in the higher convents with reference to the ability of the person coming in.

909. What sort of amount would you say is about as much you have known given at a time?—A thousand pounds was considered as the old amount.

910. For a person in what class?—In the upper classes.

911. Are a great many members admitted without any dowry at all?—A great many.

912. What proportion should you say are so admitted?—The proportion is considerable of those who are admitted quite freely. Some have expectancies, and they provide by an arrangement that, if they should succeed to that property, so much shall be paid by them.

913. Assuming a woman having property to enter one of these communities, and to become professed, and that she would devote to the uses of the community some such sum as you have mentioned, how does she deal with the rest?—It is always settled previous to profession.

914. In any way she pleases?—Perfectly.

915. Independently of the community?—Absolutely independently of the community.

916. Is it in your experience that ladies, before becoming professed, make wills?—They do make wills, but those wills are made for a particular purpose; they are made to protect themselves, and those with whom they are associating themselves, against external interference in the event of their death. Nothing ever passes under these wills. I do not suppose that, for one in a thousand that are made, a shilling is ever received; but they are simply made so that if, from any cause, a legal representative is required, there is the means of raising that legal representative, and it is preferred that it should be one of the persons in the convent rather than any person ab extra.

917. As a rule, you mean that it is an extremely rare thing that property should be acquired by a lady after she has become a nun?—One of the oldest convents in England assured me that only in one case had it occurred, and then no claim was made by the convent, but the family insisted upon the nun taking her share.

918. That was the share of a person derived by intestacy?—Yes.

919. Excepting in cases of intestacy I am afraid that legacies to professed nuns are rare things?—Very rare, so far as I know.

920. Have you ever known in your experience such a thing?—I will not say that I have not made such wills, but as to the wills coming to be proved, that is another affair.

921. Have you anything to add upon the property of convents, or the terms on which their inmates hold and possess property?—I think not. If there is any other question that I can answer upon the subject I shall be happy to do so.

922. Mr. O'Reilly.] You mentioned that the dowry in convents where the upper classes become members was generally, if a dowry was brought, about a thousand pounds?—That was the old dowry. It has been reduced very much of late years.

923. Would it be within your knowledge that the usual dowry is much less in many convents, more nearly approaching that which was stated to be the case in the instance of Saurin and Star, namely, 300 l.?—Sometimes not more than 100 l., and sometimes not 100 l.

924. Chairman.]

31 May 1870.

924. Chairman.] You state that it is very rare for the ladies who enter these convents ever to receive any fortune after profession?—Yes.

925. But is it not the case sometimes that these ladies are members of families who are in a good condition of life, and that there are marriage settlements where their portion does not accrue till the death of the parents?—That does occur; but that is always provided for before profession. The money may not then be payable; the child's portion may be very considerably in excess of the sum which she takes with her into the convent, and some member of the family will advance that sum to be repaid out of the child's portion whenever it falls in, or it is taken by way of appointment under the settlement, and she takes no more.

926. That is where a person enters a convent with the entire assent of her family?—They can receive none without that.

927. Do you state that as an invariable rule in the conventual establishments, that nobody can enter them without having the full assent of their guardians and parents?—In the case of minors it is absolutely certain; in the case of majors, of course, they are at liberty to dispose of themselves as they will.

928. It occasionally occurs, does it not, that it is very much in opposition to the wishes of their families that they enter into convents?—It is said so; but I think that, if the objections were sifted, they would amount to very little, and be found to be very insincere.

929. Did I rightly understand you to say that in England now what are called solemn vows are never made?—No, they cannot now be made in their original force; solemn vows formerly drew with them certain civil consequences, which rendered them obnoxious to the law, and which could not be effective except by comity between the civil and ecclesiastical power; that no longer exists, and therefore, as far as I know, with the exception of the Roman States and Spain, and possibly Hungary, no solemn vows, in the old sense, in the sense in which the phrase is used in the old writers can be made anywhere.

930. But there are what are called final vows?—In many orders nearly the whole life is a probationary life. The person first entering is a postulant; she or he then becomes a novice, and that for a period of one, or two, or three years; then they are admitted to be quasi members of the association, and that lasts for a further probationary period, sometimes seven, or eight, or nine years, and it may be extended at the will and discretion of the superior, according to the capacity of the person. If it is thought that they will persevere, then they are admitted to make their final vows, and they become then full members of the association; yet a great number are associated with it who never make their final vows at all.

931. It has been stated to us to be usually eight or nine years after entering the convent that the final vows are taken?—Yes, but all those are periods capable of extension at the will of the superior, and according to the circumstances of the case.

932. It is just preceding that taking of the final vows, that the arrangements with regard to property are made, is it not?—They are made before they are admitted to any association whatever.

933. When is the will made; is it upon merely entering the convent?—No; it is after what I may term the first probationary period is passed, after the postulancy and the novitiate, and immediately before admission to association.

934. Is there any period fixed or anything ascertained with respect to the time when they are required to make their wills?—The constitutions of these bodies vary; in some of them, it is at one period, and in some at another; but the period in every case is capable of extension (not contraction), at the will of the Superior.

935. Then there is nothing invariable in the rules that regulate the convents?—Nothing in that respect.

936. Perhaps you are only speaking of those that have come within your own knowledge?—My knowledge is rather extensive in that respect.

937. Did we rightly understand you to say, that you represent nearly 200 convents?—I do for this purpose, to-day, represent over 200 including the Scotch convents.

938. But does that representation imply that you have been consulted in each case?—I have been consulted in each case.

939. So far as to know the circumstances of those convents respectively?—Yes; and the information that I have given is based upon the information so received.

940. Is it the practice usually among these convents to obtain the legal services of some person with whom they are not locally connected, but who has great experience, or do they depend upon some legal adviser in their own neighbourhood?—For certain purposes, probably, every convent may have some legal adviser, but for a great many of these convents I act in all matters, and for a great number of others, Mr. Arnold acts; and so with other gentlemen in our profession. But for this purpose, which is happily not of every day occurrence, the ladies have consulted together, and they thought it better, as a great deal of the information to be communicated was of a very private nature, that it should not be communicated to all the world, but to some person in whom they had confidence, and who might use it as far as necessary for the information of this Committee.

941. I presume that they consult you about the property?—Only as to property; I have nothing to do with the government of the houses.

942. You would know what their difficulties would be in conveying their property, supposing that they desired to do so?—I am quite familiar with the mode in which their property is dealt with.

943. Did we rightly understand you that they had no difficulties when they had to convey property?—Practically there have been no difficulties. Questions have arisen upon the title, and in several instances, the persons objecting simply ask the question of me, "May we safely take this title, or do you know of anything to prevent our taking it; need we trouble ourselves to follow the money?"

944. Do you refer to persons consulting you who have sold land to the convents?—Who have bought from convents.

945. The convents have been sometimes compelled to sell, have they not?—To railway companies.

946. Have you in such cases ever heard any objection raised with regard to any question of trust?—It has been raised, but raised rather pro formâ than otherwise, for railways are no great respecters of persons or institutions either, and they care little for the title.

947. Do you make all the joint tenants parties to the conveyance?—Yes; and they enter into full vendors' covenants for title.

948. Did we rightly understand you that there is a frequent transfer of property held by convents?—It is becoming more consolidated now, because things are in better order, but there have been great changes within my knowledge; some of the large convents have moved three or four times.

949. You referred to the year 1800, I think?—My recollection does not go back to then, but I merely took that period, because 18 convents were then stated to have been existing in England with regard to all of which I have information. Some have become extinct, and some absorbed in other houses, but others have changed their residence and passed to another, and sold that again, and then to another, and in several instances have passed to a fourth, within my personal knowledge during the last 40 years.

950. Can you tell us the whole number of convents in the country at present?—I told you the number that I represent, which is very nearly the whole. They are called convents, but if you want to distinguish between what we should call convents and what are not, the convents would be comparatively very few. The institutions which I represent here with Mr. Arnold are, as I said, including England and Scotland, about 215.

951. With regard to the system of joint tenancy, which is resorted to to secure the property in the hands of the convents, are they careful in substituting one life for another, or in anticipating a death or retirement, and keeping up the same number of joint tenants as that to which the property was first conveyed?—No; it is sometimes observed, but not invariably.

952. You never knew a property fail from the death of all the joint tenants, did you?—Not any property in which a convent would be interested. I have known it to happen in the case of other property, property bought for a site for a school, for instance, and I am now before the Charity Commissioners to get a vesting order in that case.

953. Supposing that the joint tenants die, and that no other tenants have supplied their places, who would be the heir to that joint tenancy?—In the case of realty the heir-at-law of the surviving joint tenant.

954. And would there be no difficulty in his obtaining it?—I should be afraid not.

955. I mean the community itself would have no rights against him?—It would be defenceless.

956. Would a will made by any inmate of the convent in favour of the community itself be good against the heir?—Yes, perfectly, if made to another member; in the case of many of these institutions their property remains their own throughout the whole period, and is not brought into the common stock.

957. Do the joint tenants ever make a will?—Not expressly in reference to that property of which they are joint tenants.

958. But they would have a right to dispose of the property, supposing that they agree, as joint tenants, to do so?—Clearly they might go into the market and sell it to-morrow, the whole of it.

959. They might bequeath it to anybody in the convent?—Yes, if they liked to do so.

960. But they could not bequeath it for the benefit of the convent?—No, that would be illegal.

961. Mr. Matthews.] They could not bequeath it to the convent?—No, it has no capacity to take.

962. Mr. Jessel.] You have expressed a very confident opinion that convents are illegal; have you ever taken advice on the subject?—Yes, I have.

963. Have you ever received advice from counsel that convents are illegal?—I do not think that I have any written opinion to that effect, but it is a question which I have considered with a great many counsel, for a great many years.

964. Have you never seen written opinions from counsel of your own communion, to the effect that convents are legal?—I never saw one, I have seen many doubts, but I have never seen an opinion that they were legal.

965. Have you had your attention called to the fact that there is no existing Statute which makes a convent illegal; I mean no unrepealed Statute?—I am not at all of that opinion; as far as my knowledge goes, it is the other way.

966. Can you give me a reference to any existing unrepealed Statute that makes a convent illegal?—If you mean a convent by name, I cannot. I have already said that there is only one Act of Parliament prior to 1714 in which convents are mentioned.

967. Or can you refer me to any one unrepealed Act of Parliament which makes a religious community illegal; that is, a religious community bound by vows or by engagements?—No, I do not know that there is any Statute to that effect; but that has been the whole policy of the law, and of all the legislation that we have had upon that subject.

968. I daresay you know that very careful search has been made for such Statutes; a very careful search was made at the time of the passing of the two repealing Statutes that you have referred us to?—Yes.

969. And I think that I may say from the information that I have received, that no such Statute was found, and therefore you speak only of the general policy of the law?—There is no Statute making bequests for superstitious uses void, but the doctrine of superstitious uses is the creature of the law.

970. There is a Statute of Edward VI., is there not, which has been interpreted in that sense?—Exactly; and so has every other penal Statute been interpreted.

971. When you have a Statute so interpreted, the Statute with the interpretation has been considered to show what it was intended to mean?—And that has been the case with all the Statutes with relation to religious persons.

972. Can you tell me any unrepealed Statute which has been interpreted to prohibit, or make illegal, convents for women?—Until the French Revolution, which drove these ladies home, there was not a convent of women in England; but the Statute of Geo. 1 is unrepealed.

973. You have spoken of the tendency of legislation; now, of course you must throughout, of consideration the time when the Roman Catholic religion itself was illegal, because up to that time no doubt these communities would be treated as coming within the general purview of the law; but from that time, since the religion has been made a legal religion in England, has there been any decision or any interpretation of the laws to the effect that convents are illegal?—So far as I am acquainted there has not; the question has not arisen.

974. Then your opinion on the legality of convents is formed from a general impression of the law, because you cannot refer me to a Statute or to a decision?—A great many things have been affirmed to be law, for which no Statute can be named.

975. And you can name no decision for your view?—I can name no decision, because there was no matter for decision.

976. One thousand eight hundred, the date which you mentioned, was a long time ago?—Till 1832 we were under total disability; but you will find that a great many of the restraints of the penal Statutes are still in operation. All the relief given by those two Acts of the 18 Geo. 3, and the 31 Geo. 3, and by the subsequent Act of the 43 Geo. 3, is on terms with the single exception of one section.

977. That does not apply to the Statutes of the 7 & 8 and the 9 & 10 of the Queen, which is simply repealing?—Portions of sections were repealed, and some not as regards persons generally, but only as regards Roman Catholics.

978. There is no portion of any Statute remaining unrepealed which applies to religious houses of women?—There is no Statute except the Statute of Geo. 1, and the Statute of 10 Geo. 4, the Emancipation Act, which relates to men.

979. I will confine myself to women at present?—There is no other Statute on either side, either for men or women; the one is not an exceptional case, but whatever is the law with regard to one is the law in England with regard to the other. The law knew no distinction of persons; there were women recusants as well as men recusants, and they were executed indiscriminately.

980. Is there any Statute that you are aware of, except the Roman Catholic Relief Act, which applies to religious houses, so as to make them at all illegal?—No, there is none, except the Act of Geo. 1, and the 31st Geo. 3.

981. Is there any decision of any of our courts, or of any court of Ireland, to that effect?—I cannot speak as to Ireland.

982. Are you aware of any such decision?—If you confine yourself to convents, I am not; because I do not know that the case has ever arisen, and therefore I do not know of any decision.

983. Do you know of any dictum, as distinguished from a decision, which states that a religious house of women is illegal?—That was an instance which I gave you in the early part of my evidence of Lord Lougborough directing the House of Lords.

984. That was in 1800?—But the law was the same till 1832.

985. That was while the Roman Catholic religion itself was illegal; there was no question then; I am speaking, of course, since that time?—We cannot pick and choose.

986. I only ask you if you know of any dictum?—No; but if the courts are to be at liberty to draw inferences to the prejudice of what we deem most sacred things and they choose to term superstitions, you cannot rest there and say that you will confine your construction to those questions only, and that all the rest shall be open and free.

987. I ask you whether you know of any dictum to the effect that you have expressed?—I have said, and I say again, that the question has never arisen to my knowledge.

988. Do you know of any written opinion by any gentleman of eminence, or not of eminence, practising which states that convents of women are illegal?—I have never seen any such.

989. On what, then, is your opinion founded except on your impression of what would be desirable?—It is the result of conversations with a great many men through a long life, and at periods when it was necessary to examine these questions very closely in anticipation of difficulties which happily passed off, and I am only, I believe, giving expression to their opinions, and not mine; mine, of course, would be worth nothing.

990. As I understand you, your opinion as to the legality of convents is founded rather on the impression that judges might probably adapt an exploded system to the present time?—It is; I hope they would not, but I think it would be so.

991. You told us something about solemn vows and Statutes relating to them; of course those Statutes would have made the profession of a nun at that time illegal, but I cannot find anything about solemn vows in the Roman Catholic Relief Act?—No; I should be rather surprised if you did.

992. But I do find these words, and therefore I want to ask you what is their meaning, and whether they do not apply to your present religious communities, or some of them; "members of religious orders, communities, or societies of the Church of Rome bound by monastic or religious vows"?—"Monastic" would probably refer, and must refer, at least if it is to be explained in its proper sense, to solemn vows; "religious vows" would be the simple vows, which are the only vows now admissible in associations of modern date.

993. You see that the words are antagonistic, "monastic, or religious"?—They are in the disjunctive certainly; it embraces both.

994. Do not you consider that those words would apply to some "orders, members, or societies of the Church of Rome" resident here?—Clearly they would.

995. If your attention has been directed to the 33rd section of that Act you will find that the framers use a third word: "Aiding or assisting in the administering or taking any oath, vow, or engagement, purporting or intended to bind the person taking the same to the rules, ordinances, or ceremonies of such religious order, community, or society;" you see, therefore, there is the word "engagement" also used, meaning, I suppose, a preliminary step to taking vows?—I do not know what was in the mind of the framers of the Act at the time, but there is no such expression as "engagement" known to us; it has no technical signification with us, I mean.

996. Then I understand you to say that the greater part of these so-called convents are not properly convents, but would they not be communities or societies?—Yes; three or four persons residing together would be a society. A family is a society quoad its members.

997. But a society bound by some kind of religious vows, and belonging to the Church of Rome?—That word is pointed at one particular body, one of the most celebrated, most learned, and most appreciated in the Church.

998. Mr. Newdegate.] Do you mean the Jesuits?—Yes.

999. Mr. Jessel.] The Jesuits are separately named. "And whereas Jesuits and members of other religious orders and communities, or societies"; therefore that word does not apply to them?—The Jesuit body is the only body known to us as a "society," and I am afraid that Acts of Parliament are not the best specimens of accurate expression.

1000. You told us that there was practically no difficulty in dealing with the property; have you had any instances in which property has been given to these convents in consideration of teaching?—None whatever.

1000*. No foundations of that kind?—No.

1001. Nothing in the shape of charitable foundations?—Nothing within my knowledge.

1002. You have given us the income of a nun from property as substantially something under 7 l. per annum, on the average?—Yes.

1003. Of course that is not sufficient to maintain even a nun?—Probably not. When they were dishoused at the Dissolution they took but 4 l. with them; that was the Government allowance.

1004. We are directed to inquire into the terms upon which their "income, property, and estates are respectively received;" I suppose that the difference between the income from property and the actual income is made up substantially from what they receive for teaching the upper classes?—Yes; very considerable sums are received for teaching from the upper and middle classes.

1005. I understand that the sum which you mentioned was simply what was received from property, and I do not wish you to tell me if you object to it, but I presume that the total income is very moderate?—Very moderate indeed.

1006. Mr. Matthews.] Could you give it us with any accuracy?—I do not very well see how I could, without going into an explanation of how I arrived at it.

1007. Mr. Jessel.] Would you tell us whether there is any grievance, in your opinion, which requires relief at the hands of the Legislature?—I like to see property well secured and well settled, and freed from every risk or impediment.

1008. That is to say, as regards nuns, you would like to see these doubts, which I understand from you are entertained by many members of the community, taken away altogether?—If there be no ground for them, let the law say so.

1009. And as regards monks, as to whom you have not given us any information, but as to the legal status of whom there is really no question, have you known of any difficulties in dealing with their property?—None whatever, because they have no property quâ monks at all; I mean, with them as with nuns, the property is the property of the individuals.

1010. Then, as far as you know, there is no property which would be liable to forfeiture by reason of the enactments of the Roman Catholic Relief Act, as regards the monks bound by vows?—My answer, perhaps, would lead to further answers.

1011. You cannot do any harm, I presume, by saying yes or no?—The Roman Catholic Relief Act does not touch the property of the persons so bound; there is nothing to prevent them holding property here; they cannot reside here, but there is no reason why I should not manage it here for them.

1012. I am afraid that that could hardly be right if the community is illegal?—You referred to the Act, and the Act is directed to persons, and not to bodies, and my answer was the same.

1013. As I read the Act (perhaps you will tell me if I read it wrongly), it makes it illegal to be a member in England of such a body?—Yes; and you must leave the country if you are.

1014. You are guilty of a misdemeanor besides, and may be punished by fine and imprisonment; that is a great wrong, in your view?—Yes, that is a great wrong; such persons residing here are all liable to that, no doubt.

1015. Then the association is altogether illegal?—The association, I take it, would be illegal, not by that Act, but a person belonging to that association incurs certain penalties which are personal to himself. What is true of the individual, I suppose, is true in the aggregate; but there is nothing in the Act about it.

1016. As far as I understand the Act, there is a recital which says that these religious bodies are to be suppressed, and penalties are imposed upon persons entering into them, and upon persons coming over here who already belong to them?—But those are all personal penalties; there are no forfeitures.

1017. But do not you, as a lawyer, consider that the effect of that Act is to make the association itself illegal?—No; because upon the hypothesis which is provided for there, the association may be abroad. The individuals may be here; if they are here, being members, they are liable to expulsion, it is not necessary that it should be an English association at all, but a foreign Jesuit is equally liable to expulsion, and to imprisonment, and to transportation.

1018. I will put the question in another way; suppose that a conveyance were made upon trust for certain persons, members of a religious community of the Church of Rome, bound by religious vows, would it be a legal trust?—The first question there would be, in what capacity they took. If they took as beneficiaries, I believe that there is nothing in the Emancipation Act to disentitle them to the enjoyment of their property.

1019. The proposition which I put to you, was a trust for the community?—Such a trust, of course, would be void by the very terms of it.

1020. It would be void upon that ground, would it not?—Not under that Act, I take it, but under the old law.

1021. I am not aware of any such old law; what old law do you mean?—There is no statutory law making it void.

1022. It is only made illegal by the terms of this Relief Act?—They were entitled to be here in any numbers they pleased, down to the passing of that Act.

1023. We will assume for the present moment that it is illegal; as far as I understand you to say, you know of no difficulty affording a ground or reason for altering the law as far as property is concerned?—No; if things were to remain as they are now, and if it is treated, as it must then continue to be treated, as private property, we want no alteration, but simply to be let alone.

1024. What I want to know is this, do you consider it a grievance under which members of the Roman Catholic communion labour, that monks are not allowed to hold property as such?—Yes, I do consider that a grievance, undoubtedly.

edly. I think that if the Catholic religion is legalised in this country, we are entitled to its enjoyment in its fullest extent; every other body in the State has it; why are we to be excluded?

1025. Has any inconvenience been found or felt from the existing state of the law as regards monks?—It has not been felt, but we have been obliged to have recourse to a state of things which we would not willingly have had; we would rather have had a better state of things; but having no choice in the matter, we can only treat the whole as private property; so it is dealt with, and so it must continue to be. I consider that a grievance.

1026. Chairman.] You would not alter the laws of Mortmain, would you?—No; but I would not extend them.

1027. You would not recommend, would you, that property belonging to a religious community should be inalienable?—You might limit the quantity of land that they were to take; but, practically, they only hold enough to keep a cow or so, for the support of the inmates of the house.

1028. Mr. Newdegate.] In continuation of your evidence, I would ask whether your attention has been directed to the 37th section of the 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, which says, "Provided always, and be it enacted, that nothing herein contained shall extend. or be construed to extend, in any manner to affect any religious order, community or establishment, consisting of females bound by religious or monastic vows:" are you aware that that exception is an exception in favour of convents of women, as against the restrictions previously recited against the male orders of the Church of Rome?—It relieves them; that is to say, provides that the personal penalties imposed, the penalties of banishment, and transportation (for it may come to that), are not to be incurred by women, even if they should be bound by any such vow; that is all. It does not legalise them; they could not incur fresh penalties by reason of their having done it, but they are open to the old penalties.

1029. An exception from a prohibition is a special permission in law, is it not?—It would be so if those were the terms of the Act; but that is just what the Act is not; it is not an exception from the prohibition at all; it merely declares that the penalties imposed by that Act shall not extend to certain individuals; it says nothing about the prohibition.

1030. Are not they not penalties in restraint?—The penalties were to provide for the gradual extradition of the whole of these gentlemen.

1031. And is not that a restraint upon the establishment of these male orders of the Church of Rome in this country?—It is a restraint, and a restraint upon the Catholic religion.

1032. Is it not a restraint upon the establishment of the male orders of the Church of Rome, in this country?—If it were enforced it would be, because we should have no persons fulfilling that condition.

1033. And an exception from that restraint is a permission in favour of the orders of women?—That may be your construction, but I cannot follow it.

1034. You do not admit that?—No; I admit that they are relieved from the penalties, but the law in other respects is the same for both.

1035. Chairman.] We do not misunderstand you, do we, when you state that new penalties were inflicted by the 10 Geo. 4?—That is so.

1036. And that women are saved from the new penalties therein contained?—Yes.

1037. But that whatever penalties existed before, continue still?—Yes.

1038. Mr. Newdegate.] You have assented to the proposition that the penalties in the Statute of 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, are new penalties?—They are new penalties.

1039. Do you mean by new penalties that there were no equivalent penalties or restraints in the law previous to the passing of that Statute?—There were many restraints, punishment of death, forfeiture of goods and chattels, perpetual imprisonment, and a great variety of penalties.

1040. These restraints in the Statute of 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, were a mitigation of the restraints previously existing by Statute, were they not?—I take it that they were not; I take it that they were an augmentation.

1041. Then, taking it in your own sense, they were a re-affirmation of the intention of the law previous to the passing of that Statute?—In my opinion it was substantially a re-enactment of all of the old penalties with the addition of the new ones imposed by that Act.

1042. The principle was the same?—The principle was the same; if they had taken the oath, they were as much at liberty to remain in this country and hold property for individual purposes as any other inhabitant of Her Majesty's realm.

1043. Practically, is it not the fact, that notwithstanding these penalties, communities and societies of a monastic character, comprising monks and friars, do exist in this country?—Undoubtedly, and I hope they always will.

1044. Notwithstanding that Act containing those penalties?—Notwithstanding that restraint of conscience.

1045. Is it not the fact that the Jesuits, who are particularly pointed to in this Statute, or rather you would say pointed at, are now known to exist in this country and even attach the signs of their order to their names?—I do not know the fact, but they may do so; I know that there are certain indications put after names which I have often seen in print.

1046. Do you know the "Catholic Directory"?—I do.

1047. Do you consider that a work of authority among the Roman Catholic community?—So far as the Church offices are concerned it is of authority, carefully prepared and published for that purpose.

1048. It is headed, "published by Burns, Oates & Co. of London," and it is stated upon the titlepage, "permissu superiorum"?—That relates to the Church offices only, so far as I know and believe.

1049. Then that does not relate to the long list of chapels, schools, communities of men, convents, or the like?—Certainly not.

1050. Then this is not a work of authority?—As far as the order of the Church offices goes, it is a work of authority, not otherwise.

1051. It is a work of authority with respect to the conventual or monastic institutions or chapels, or anything else?—No, of no authority at all.

1052. Then it will be necessary for this Committee, if they wish for a work of authority, to apply elsewhere for such information?—No one would receive that book as authority; it is a useful useful book, and it may be all true, but it carries no authority with it, except, as I said before, in regard to the order of the Church offices with which it commences, and that is published in a separate form for the use of the clergy, and the publisher chooses to superadd all the rest; I know that the Directory is not correct from the correspondence and communications which I have recently received.

1053. Do you possess information which proves to you that the list of institutions and individuals given in this work is incorrect?—In some particulars, certainly; I have not compared them, except in a few particulars, and in the few particulars in which I did compare them I found that it was wrong.

1054. On page 111 of that book, under the head of "Diocese of Westminster," I find this: "Communities of Men — Augustinian Fathers, St. Monica's, Hoxton Square, N. Carmelites (discalced), 5, Vicarage-place, Kensington, W. Charity (Fathers of), 170, Culford Road, Kingsland, N. Dominican Fathers, St. Dominic's Priory, Haverstock Hill, N.W. Jesuit Fathers, 111, Mount Street, W. St. Mary's, Horseferry Road, Westminster, S.W.": are none of these announcements correct?—That is a subject on which I have no information whatever to give.

1056. Your opinion is, that the convents of women are equally illegal with the societies of men?—Yes, I do believe that.

1057. Might I ask you the foundation of that opinion, because it appears that there is a difference as to the Statutes referring to them; do you refer to the general prohibitions of the English law against the supremacy of any authority other than that of the Crown, to the laws against which are called superstitious uses, and to the laws of Mortmain, as containing the principles of law which render these communities illegal?—Yes; I refer to those, and I refer also to all the acts done and enactments passed in restraint of these bodies, or the individual members of them, whether they were at home or came from abroad.

1058. Are you aware that there is a petition before the House of Commons, presented in the year 1845, from the Roman Catholic bishops in Ireland and 1,000 priests, complaining that these laws enacting the supremacy of the Crown and the prohibition against superstitious uses, and the law of Mortmain, were enforced in Ireland by the Bequest Act, which establishes commissioners for the regulation of Roman Catholic property in Ireland?—The Act of Geo. 2 does not extend to Ireland, I believe.

1059. But are you aware of that petition?—I never heard anything of the petition.

1060. But, generally, your previous answer is in accordance with those objections to the doctrine of the supremacy of the Crown, and the prohibition of what are called superstitious uses, meaning prayers for the dead, and of alienations in mortmain, which the law of England contains?—There are no people who will maintain the supremacy of the Crown in all civil matters more faithfully than Catholics; but beyond that we do not go, and therefore any restraints that may result to us from our holding that opinion with respect to the spiritual supremacy of the Crown we think are unjust.

1061. I understand generally, then, that you desire an alteration in the law of England which will satisfy the Roman Catholic opinions in favour of monastic and conventual institutions as they have existed abroad?—I do not know how they have existed abroad, but I desire that they should have a legal existence here in the spirit in which they are contemplated by the Church. How they are managed abroad I know nothing about.

1064. And it is on account of that objection chiefly that you have stated that convents are illegal?—I do not know that it is on that account chiefly. I stated very much at large, I think, the grounds upon which my opinions, whatever they may be worth, are founded, and that among the rest. I think that anything in restraint of conscience is objectionable.

1065. I think you have stated that the real property possessed by nuns, or by communities of nuns, comes to only to 2 roods 34 perches per head?—Yes, it is so.

1066. And you also stated that that is less than the proportion of land to each of the population in Great Britain?—Yes.

1067. You did not mean that the land was possessed individually by each member of those communities?—No, clearly not.

1068. Therefore the comparison was only to show how small the proportion is; you also stated that this property consists chiefly in the sites of their residences, and gardens; are you aware that they possess farms and other property?—There are a few instances in which I do not think that the ladies cultivate the whole themselves, but some portions are let. But, with those exceptions, I believe the land is in their own occupation.

1069. Is there not a farm belonging to a convent on the borders of the parishes of Hinckley and Burbage, in Leicestershire?—I know no farm there.

1070. Do you know that there is some property attached to the convent at Atherstone in Warwickshire?—There is a small property held with the convent building, that is all.

1071. Are you aware that it is let off?—No, I was not aware of that; I thought it was all in the occupation of the ladies.

1072. You have used the word "land" as describing the property possessed by some convents, or the inmates thereof; did you use that word "land" in the sense of including houses?—The house occupied by the ladies is included, of course.

1073. But do you include it in the sense in which "land" is used in Acts of Parliament as meaning, in other words, real property?—Yes; it extends to all their real property, and the computation which I made is based upon the assumption assumption that it includes everything so far as it can be ascertained. The land is sometimes only an affair of a few feet.

1074. But if there were any houses in towns belonging to these institutions, you intended to include them under the term "land"?—Yes.

1075. You stated, did you not, that there has been a very great change in the character of these convents from what they were at the commencement of the century?—I did; that is to say, not in the convents then existing, because they are the same; but in the increase or supposed increase of these communities. What I wished to convey was, that the older communities, those best known to our law, and those particularly within the purview of the penal Statutes, have not increased, but have remained stationary; and the increase has been in new associations adapted to new wants and to the great increase of Catholics in certain localities, and of the poor particularly.

1076. You have, probably, seen in the newspapers some reference to the convent at Baddesley Clinton, in Warwickshire; do you know that convent?—I know Baddesley Clinton well.

1077. It is given in the Roman Catholic Directory, under the head of "Diocese of Birmingham," page 134, as "Poor Clares, Baddesley"; do you know that convent?—I know Baddesley very well.

1078. Then you know the convent?—I know the house; I have been there frequently.

1079. Are you aware that there are two classes of nuns in that convent; one class visiting nuns to visit the poor, and the other what is termed the inner circle, who are cloistered nuns?—There are some cloistered ladies, or rather I do not know whether they are cloistered or not, because on those matters I am not going to speak; but there are ladies there who do not occupy themselves in the instruction of the poor, and there are some who do; but as to what classes they resolve themselves into, I have nothing to say.

1080. They are described to us as of the inner circle?—Those are terms that I do not adopt.

1081. There is a distinction among the nuns in that convent, is there not?—There is in all; the ladies occupy themselves, some in one respect, and some in another, some in literature, some in music, some in instruction.

1082. In whom is the property of that convent vested?—They have only a lease.

1083. A long lease?—I really do not know what the term is; I believe it is a long term.

1084. A very long lease?—No, certainly not a very long lease.

1085. Perhaps you can furnish the Committee with information about that afterwards?—When I stated that I had a personal knowledge of the locality, I felt myself called upon to say a little more than I should otherwise have done, but I think I must not go further.

1086. Mr. Jessel.] Do you consider those the secrets of your clients?—I do.

1087. Mr. Newdegate.] You have stated, I think, that there is a change in the character of these convents, as regulated by the rules prescribed by the Church of Rome?—Pardon me, the change is not in the convents themselves, but in the organisation of new associations to meet new wants, the wants of modern society and modern times, arising from the great increase of poverty, great increase of population, great increase of crime, and all those many things which have to be considered and provided for in a great community. There is no change in the orders themselves, what the Benedictines were in the sixth century when they were established, they are now; the rules are the same.

1088. The rules of the Benedictines are unchanged?—As those of all the societies; the rules do not change, but new organisations spring up to meet new wants; the old communities remain just as they were.

1089. And, therefore, when we find the Benedictine Order, or the Carmelite Order, we find a community regulated by the rules of that order as known for centuries?—Yes, so far as they are applicable to modern times, for some of them could not be executed; but in principle they are unchanged.

1090. The difference is, if I might so express it, that the rules have been relaxed for the purpose of missionary and charitable work?—That is the case with some of them; but with many the education of the upper classes is the great means of subsistence, as you will see by the figures which I gave you this morning, and it is the returns from the ladies' schools which they keep which support the houses. Now, that is foreign to the original institute, but it has been admitted from the necessity of the times.

1091. "The Little Sisters of the Poor" are comparatively a new order, are they not?—They are.

1092. They are of the nature of Sœurs de la Charité?—They are, but they harbour the poor; they receive them into their homes and nurse them, and tend them during their last years or during their infirmity.

1093. Sœurs de la Charité, and several orders of that kind, are considered authorised by the laws of France, are they not?—Yes; the Sœurs de la Charité are the only order that were spared in the Revolution; they were excepted in the decree of 1794.

1094. They are authorised by the laws of France?—Certainly they are.

1095. And there are orders that are not authorised by the laws of France?—As I understand the law of France it is this: the orders are distinguished into two classes, that is for legal purposes, the authorised and the unauthorised orders. The authorised ones are regulated by several decrees: the principal one which imposed terms upon persons applying for an authorisation dates in 1825, and from that time the applications for authorisation have been comparatively small; that arose from the terms of the decree, and from certain requirements which it was not convenient to many of these associations to comply with. There was nothing to be gained from the authorisation; it gave a quasi corporate existence, that was all; and I believe that the number of unauthorised are far in excess of the number of authorised convents in France. The authorisation simply means that they are registered, and have acquired a quasi-corporate existence.

1096. One condition of authorisation in France is, that the law of France shall not be held to sanction perpetual vows, is it not?—That is a matter that touches the internal organisation of a convent, and the authorisation does not regard that; it simply requires that a certified copy of the rules should be furnished, that they should have the consent of the ordinary, and that they submit themselves in all spiritual matters to his government without the intervention of any third party.

1097. The law of France makes a distinction between the orders that it authorises and the orders that it does not authorise?—Practically it does not, for questions have arisen in the French courts as to the interests that unauthorised orders would enjoy when legacies have been made in their favour, and, as far as I can make out the distinction, is practically little or nothing. In the one case, that of the unauthorised community, the money is handed over to them, and they can deal with it in any way they like; and in the case of the authorised community, they have a corporate fund. In the unauthorised convents the property is held, not in the name of the community, but in the names of the individuals.

1098. In fact, the property of the unauthorised convents and monasteries in France is held in the same manner as the property of these institutions is held in England?—Substantially it is so.

1099. But you are aware that under the Act of 1860, the Roman Catholics Charities Act, there are provisions whereby the property in convents of women might be authorised?—No, I am not aware of that.

1100. Do you know the Roman Catholic Charities Act of 1860?—Yes.

1101. You are not aware that one of the provisions of that Act is to that effect?—No.

1102. You stated that in 1861 you enrolled a great number of deeds?—I did.

1103. And at very considerable expense?—Yes.

1104. Have you enrolled a great number of deeds since that period?—Whenever occasion arose, certainly, without hesitation.

1105. Was that enrolment made under the provisions of the Roman Catholic Charities Act of 1860?—Yes.

1106. Subsequent enrolments have been made under the provisions of that Statute, and the subsequent Statutes?—Yes; I am not aware of any practical alteration that has been made since the Act of 1860, except that which I mentioned which was made by, I think, the Act of the 24th of the Queen, c. 9, which provides for the enrolment of the trust deed, rather than the deed by which the legal estate is acquired.

1107. Are you aware of the provisions of the Statute 32 & 33 Vict. c. 100, entitled "An Act for amending the Charitable Trusts Act"?—Yes, I know the Act.

1108. Have you made any enrolments under the provisions of that Statute?—That Act is dated 1869; I do not think that I have had any deed to enrol since that.

1109. Then the enrolments that you have made were previous to the enactment of that Statute?—Yes, the greater number of enrolments that I spoke of, were made many years ago, as soon as I was ready after the passing of the Act of 1860.

1110. And have you continued to enrol since 1861?—Certainly, and I hope to continue to do so whenever occasion may arise. I have not the smallest objection to enrolment.

1111. You stated when you gave the number of convents, the number of their inhabitants, and the amount of their property, that it was a general statement without particulars?—Pardon me, I did not give any of those details. I purposely objected. I did not state the quantity of land, nor the amount of personal property, nor the number of the ladies. I gave you the apportionment that I had made showing what, supposing that they had a several interest, that interest would amount to in lands and hereditaments, and also supposing that they had a several interest, what that interest would be in the personal estate.

1112. You do not feel at liberty to give the particulars upon which the statement which you have furnished, was founded?—No, I ought not to do that; I think as things are it might be attended with difficulty.

1113. Mr. Pease.] You named the amount of 6 l. 13 s. 3 d. as the average income of each nun, in addition to her beneficial interest in 2 roods and 34 perches of real estate; does that constitute, on the average, the only certain income of each member of these 215 nunneries of which you have spoken?—The only fixed income, certainly.

1114. Is the rest of the income required for their maintenance, derived from the educational fees received from the upper and middle classes that you have mentioned?—As to most of the convents it is. As to the poorer convents, some are supported altogether upon alms.

1115. In your statement, do you include the conventual institutions for males?—No, I have not concerned myself with them; I was not asked to interfere on their behalf.

1116. They are not at all returned in your figures?—No, my return is confined entirely to the ladies.

1117. You state that in civil matters the inmates of these institutions owe no allegiance above that which they owe to the Crown of England to any other foreign power?—Clearly not in civil matters.

1118. But that in religious matters the dictates of conscience are paramount to any other consideration?—Yes, conscience before everything.

1119. Can you conceive any circumstances which would render it dangerous to the stability of the form of Constitutional Government which we have now in England, if the law should acknowledge these institutions?—Not in the least.

1120. Do you think that it would add to the loyalty of the Roman Catholic population?—I do not think that it would add to our loyalty, because loyalty with us is a matter of conscience; but it would encourage us.

1121. Mr. Bourke.] You have not paid much attention to monasteries, have you?—I am not to be examined, I believe, on that subject. There is a friend of mine who will give you similar information with regard to monasteries to that which I have given in regard to the ladies.

1122. I think you have told the Committee that most of this property that you have spoken about is vested in joint tenants?—Yes.

1123. Have you ever known property of that kind vested in joint tenants pay succession duty?—Yes.

1124. In ordinary cases does it pay succession duty?—It does not often arise; but I have known it. But the Government have a great advantage against us in dealing with this property as common stock, because the income tax so paid is very largely in excess of anything that would be otherwise payable. If you took the income as severalty and divided it, no income tax would be payable at all as would be seen from the statement which I gave this morning; but taking it in globo, a large amount of income tax is paid, so that the Government get in that way an infinitely larger amount than they could get from the succession duty.

1125. With regard to the question asked you by the honourable Member for Dover as to the danger to which this property is subjected, does that danger arise in your mind from the existence of the legal doctrine with regard to superstitious uses?—No, because those uses are not connected with the property as I hold. It is held as the property of the individuals in whom it is vested, and to whom it is conveyed.

1126. So that that doctrine with regard to superstitious uses does not form any portion of the illegality at all that arises with regard to this property in your mind?—Not at all.

1127. I dare say you know that sometimes it has been said that the doctrine of implied trusts makes this property illegal?—Well, a question of the sort might arise.

1129. Supposing it is the doctrine of the Catholic religion that when a priest gets the benefit of a donation, he is then bound to pray for the soul of the donor, would that in your opinion make the trust a superstitious trust, that is to say, for a superstitious use?—As the law has been explained by the judges, I suppose it would not, because they seem to hold that the condition must be expressed; that whatever is given is given upon terms to do a particular act. They declare that act to be illegal, and the imposing of that act upon the recipient would vitiate the gift. That was held by Lord Cottenham in the case of West and Shuttleworth, and the sum in question was handed over to the next of kin.

1130. You think that no implied duty on the part of a priest to say mass for the soul of the donor, unless expressed in the trust, would vitiate trust?—I do not think that question could occur or be raised.

1131. Mr. Jessel.] A gift to a priest to say mass is illegal at present?—Yes.

1132. Mr. Talbot.] I think, in answer to the honourable and learned gentleman, the Member for Dover, you said, that the grievance felt by you and your co-religionists, with regard to this monastic property is, that it is private property; you mean that you are not able to recognise it as the property of the monastery or convent, but only as private property; that you said is a grievance in your eyes?—In my eyes it is; I do not know that it would be commonly considered so.

1133. You consider it a grievance?—I do.

1134. You would not object to these institutions being recognised by the law?—I should not object at all.

1135. If that is what you desire, and these institutions were recognised by the law, I suppose you would not object to their being under proper inspection like other institutions?—That is a totally different question.

1136. You say now, that the grievance is, that the institutions are private, and you wish them to be made public?—There is no condition of public property that leads up to inspection such as is proposed in regard to convents.

1137. With regard to reformatories?—They are all open to inspection, but the ladies in a convent are a private family.

1138. I want to find out from you whether, supposing these institutions to be changed from private institutions, which you complain that they now are, to public institutions, you would object to abiding by the conditions under which public institutions exist?—When you say, I object to their being private institutions, I object not from any particular inconvenience resulting from that, because we have managed for a great number of years, and can continue to manage, whether we get assistance from the law or not; but on public grounds, I think that it would be infinitely better to give us facilities for holding property for these purposes expressly.

1139. As things are now, you are obliged to go to work in a roundabout way, and instead of establishing these convents you give the property to individuals as trustees, and you never recognise the convents as institutions?—We do not give it to trustees, they take it absolutely.

1140. These persons are really in the position of trustees; they hold the property as if they were trustees?—No; I do not admit that.

1141. In what capacity do they hold the property?—As owners.

1142. But it is very well known that they hold it for the benefit of the institution?—They are living together; and as long as they are so minded things will go on as they are.

1143. But you have stated already that you would prefer that the law should look the matter boldly in the face, and say, "These are institutions which we do not object to recognise"?—I should, undoubtedly. I am in favour of publicity.

1144. If you are anxious for publicity, do you object to the responsibilities which belong to publicity?—All proper responsibilities I am willing to undertake; nothing beyond.

1145. You said, in answer to a previous question, that you had never known any gifts to these conventual institutions?—I do not remember, at this time, any gift at all.

1146. Do you mean that all the property is purchased?—I have heard of sums contributed for building a church or schools, and other such objects. I have heard of assistance being given where it was proposed to add to a building. I have heard of persons sending small sums by way of contributions in aid of a common object; but as to anything by way of endowment, I never heard of anything like it.

1147. Is the Committee to understand that you have never heard of property in money or land being given to these institutions?—I know of one instance. I do not know whether the land was bought in that case, but I believe it was the property of the founder; but there, I understand, a deed was made and executed. But that is not at all a common case.

1148. There is a large convent near Alton Towers; that you know, of course, by name?—I do not think that there is any convent near Alton Towers. I think that there are some ladies who occupy a small house there, and have charge of a school.

1149. I do not want the technicalities title of it; but is there not an institution in the neighbourhood of Alton Towers?—There is a large boys' school there.

1150. I was going to ask you whether that convent, and many others, have not been practically founded by private benefaction?—All the older convents date from a very early period indeed; some preserved a small portion of the property which they possessed abroad, and others have economised the money that they have made in instruction and otherwise.

1151. Is the Committee to understand (for the question is on rather an important point), that no private benefactions, except in one case, that you are aware of, have been made by pious Roman Roman Catholics to these institutions?—I cannot undertake to say that; I only spoke of my own personal knowledge.

1152. But I thought that you represented all the convents in Great Britain?—I do so; that is to say, I have ascertained what their property now is, both real and personal; and I have made a very careful examination of the whole subject, and have given the Committee the results; but as for saying that I have gone into the history of what moneys there may be, or how those moneys arose, that would be impossible.

1153. You stated that, as far as you knew, there was only one case in which these institutions had acquired property by gift?—Only one case that has come within my own personal knowledge.

1154. Who pays the rates on these properties?—They are paid out of the earnings of the house.

1155. Who pays them?—The person charged.

1156. Who is the person entered in the rate book?—I suppose the superior for the time being; they make the same arrangements as other persons in that respect.

1157. The superior would be the occupier in the eye of the law?—I suppose so.

1158. Mr. Gregory.] These monastic and conventual institutions are, I presume, all regulated by some written code?—As far as they are an organisation inter se, certainly it is the case; they have a rule for all that they do.

1159. Do those regulations affect the administration of their property in any way?—No.

1160. But they enforce poverty among the members, do they not?—Not necessarily; not all the orders; many of them possess their property, and continue to exercise their rights as owners over it.

1161. I am not talking of their property as individuals, but of their property as members of the community; would not the regulations affect their rights to that?—I am speaking of the property in gross; I do not distinguish.

1162. You say that the regulations would not affect their right to the common fund in any way?—I do not quite understand the question.

1163. There is a common fund vested in trustees; it is entrusted absolutely, as we know, without any declaration of trust; that by usage is applied to the common purposes of the institution, is it not?—In some of the houses it is, in others the property remains in the names of the individuals, and so long as they are members they pay in; or those who hold their powers of attorney pay in to the bankers of the association, or to an account in the name of somebody or other, their contributions towards the common fund.

1164. Those are external trusts, I may say, using the term trusts in a conventional sense?—They are not strictly trusts at all.

1165. But this property is external to the institution; the institution derives a certain benefit from this property in the hands of other parties?—They do as long as those parties are members of the association; but there is nothing to prevent their carrying it off if they choose.

1166. Or any member of the association might file a bill for a division of the property, I suppose?—I take it not.

1167. Why not?—I do not think that they would be entitled to it.

1169. However, there is nothing in the rules of the institutions, as I understand you, which could be pleaded in bar of such a claim as that?—The rules of the institution regard the internal government, the occupation of the inmates, the hours of prayer, the duties to which they should apply themselves within the house or without. When you spoke just now of the rule, I applied it to the approved rule upon which these institutions proceed; that only relates to conscience, it does not go beyond; it does not touch any legal matter.

1170. It does not affect their rights to the common fund?—No, the rule would not, I presume.

1171. But, I presume, it would be binding upon their conscience not to seek to divide the common fund?—That is a matter for every individual to settle for himself.

1172. These trustees in whom this property is vested have the absolute dominion over it, both legally and equitably?—The persons in whom the property is vested (I would not call them trustees) have the absolute legal and equitable disposal of it; as far as the law is concerned, nobody can touch them.

1173. Mr. O'Reilly.] You have stated something of the French law; as far as you know, is there any penalty on members of unauthorised societies or communities in France, or on such communities themselves?—None at all.

1174. Is it not the case that there are simply special privileges, which are not considered very valuable, given by the law to what are classed as authorised associations?—Yes; as I understand it, the religious communities in France find no advantage in the authorisation, and therefore they have ceased to seek it.

1175. Is not the only advantage, so far as you know, a quasi incorporation, which, in the eyes of the French law, puts them, so to speak, in the position of what is called in French, "Minors of the State," with regard to whose property the State is a trustee?—Yes; and I should judge from one of the decrees on the subject, the decree of 1825, that the French Government found that they had quite enough to do with questions that might arise in regard to authorisation, and would rather relieve themselves from any more difficulties.

1176. Is it within your knowledge also that members of many communities in France much prefer to be unauthorised?—Clearly.

1177. You have been asked whether, as far as your knowledge went, gifts to convents of women were numerous or common, and you said that they were not; would you not apply that to large gifts either of land or property; and is it not the case in England, as I know it is in Ireland, that a large number of convents, especially those connected with schools, have been erected with the aid of public subscriptions?—It is not the case in England.

1178. I do not wish to ask you any question on the number of inmates in the convents with regard to which you have given evidence, as you do not wish to state it, but is it not the fact that several of these are houses consisting of only a very small number of inmates, perhaps from three to six, teaching a school?—Yes, and even less than that number.

1179. Chairman.] I think that you have distinguished between convents and communities, and that you have stated that the greater portion of those places that are regarded as convents in this country are nothing but independent communities?—That is all.

1180. When you stated that you represented

31 May 1870.

215 convents, did you mean convents proper or merely these independent communities?—All these institutions, under whatever classification they might come.

1181. These communities are not obnoxious to the law, are they?—It is very difficult to say.

1182. You say, as I understand you, that there are no vows in them, and the persons are not bound?—I did not say that there are no vows; there are vows, but there is no inclosure.

1183. What do you mean by "inclosure"?—There are some that do not conduct external work, but all their teaching is conducted within. There are others who have no teaching within the house proper but attend schools without, and there give instruction.

1184. Is your distinction so complete as to indicate any difference in the effect of the law with regard to receiving or acquiring property?—No; that is one of the things which I thought I had explained; as far as the law is concerned there is practically no difference; there is no objection to a convent more than there is to any one of these teaching establishments.

1185. As a convent proper is an illegal institution, in your opinion, does that apply to the independent communities?—I hardly know where to draw the line, one trenches so nearly upon the other, and the distinctions are so minute that it would be very hard to do so. I attempted to make a classification, but I found that it would be subject to so many difficulties that I gave up the attempt.

1186. Then the distinction between a community and a convent is a distinction without a difference?—As far as the law is concerned I take it practically to be so.

1187. Mr. Matthews.] Just let me put a few questions, in consequence of what I thought was a misunderstanding on your part of the question which the honourable Member for Dover was asking you; you do not doubt that the penal clauses in the Emancipation Act, make life in a monastery, by a man bound by vows in England, illegal?—I do not; his very presence here is illegal.

1188. Do you doubt the decision in Sims and Quinlan, that a gift, conveyance, or bequest in trust, for the maintenance of such a person is a void trust?—No, I believe that is perfectly good law.

1189. Is it not in order to evade that illegality which results from the Emancipation Act that you have recourse to these joint tenants as absolute owners without any trust?—For that, and other reasons; a trust of that kind would be void at once.

1190. You cannot create that trust, because it is void, and, therefore, you are obliged to have no trust at all?—As far as the support of the monastery is concerned, we can have no trust.

1191. Does not that expose the members of such an institution to the risk of being deprived of the enjoyment of that property?—Clearly; the joint tenants might extrude every man in the house, if they pleased.

1192. Is not it an inconvenience, that persons bound by religious vows should be dependent on the goodwill and pleasure of certain others?—Yes, I only meant in what I said just now that, within my knowledge, such a thing has never happened.

1193. You mean that hitherto the persons in whom the property has been vested, have been good enough to allow other members of the community to enjoy it?—As far as the communities go, I have not known any instances to the contrary; as far as charities go, I have.

1194. That is to say, you have known cases where the things being illegal, the persons in whom the legal estate was vested, have appropriated the property to themselves?—Yes.

1195. Should you not consider it a great change for the better if you were allowed to create a legal trust in favour of the inmates of a given community, and enrol that trust or, at any rate, have legal remedies to enforce it?—If it stopped there I should, undoubtedly; but if it were to be conditioned, and one of the conditions were to be inspection, I would not take it at any price.

1196. Of course inspection of the life of the inmates would not be bearable; but you would have no objection, would you, to either the Court of Chancery, or the Charity Commissioners, or some public authority, compelling the due performance of trusts, in favour of communities of this sort?—Certainly not; like any other institution.

1197. You are at present deprived of the protection of the law, because you are obliged to have no trust at all, but to trust to the honour of the persons who are joint tenants?—Yes.

1198. Chairman.] Is it not a fact that it has been the subject of complaint by Catholics, that they have known the administration of the trust not to be in conformity with the intention of the ancestors or donors, and yet they had no remedy?—That was so in the case of our charities.

1199. These deeds are enrolled for charitable purposes; the person who has the legal estate is very often a person who knows nothing about the trust, and there have been cases, I believe, where those who considered that they had a right to interfere, could not get any redress?—I hardly know to what class of cases you are referring; if you refer to charities, I know that it was so before 1860. Before we had all the protection which the law has now given us in regard to charities, it did happen.

1200. The heir or next of kin might interfere, and complain that the trusts are not administered in conformity with the intention of the donor?—Unfortunately it has happened in cases before it reached the heir.

1201. These charities are not noticed by our law?—They are not; we do not admit them to be charities at all, they are families.

1202. Mr. Matthews.] The Chairman is asking you of charities, and you are speaking of convents, are you not?—But the Chairman spoke of convents as charities, and I could not admit that they were.

1203. Mr. Newdegate.] You have spoken of the large number of enrolments that you have made since 1861; was there not conventual property among those enrolments?—No, not in one, according to my recollection.

1204. Then you hold that a convent is not a charity?—I have always so considered.

1205. In the sense of the Church of Rome it is a charity, but not in the sense of the law of England, as you have made use of the term?—I say nothing about the Church of Rome, because that is a theological question that does not touch the case here; but I speak of it as far as the law goes, and I know no other law here but the law of the land.

1206. I thought you said that these institutions were regulated according to the rules of the Church of Rome?—That was with regard to a state of things antecedent to the dissolution of monasteries.

1207. Are they not now regulated according to o the rules of the Church of Rome?—Those ules have been very much modified.

1208. But according to the present rules of he Church of Rome?—Only as regards their nternal organisation, as between themselves, in natters of conscience, not in matter of property.

1209. I do not understand you to say that hese convents which teach, and which provide urses, are not charities in the sense of the Church of Rome?—But I think the inquiry is ot as to what the Church of Rome holds; but s to what the English law holds.

1210. The rules by which these institutions re regulated are those approved by the Church f Rome?—They are only rules for their internal overnment; they are all printed, and might be een by anyone; there is no mystery about them t all; I believe that there is not a rule in any art of the earth which has not been printed or ublished in some form.

1211. Does not the Church of Rome hold that onventual establishments in Italy are charitable nstitutions?—There are none such, except in he Roman States, or what remains of the Roman States.

1212. In the Roman States, is it not so held? —I really am not competent to speak of that. They have a civil law there, as well as the law f the Church. What their status is under the ivil law, as it is administered now there, I eally cannot tell you.

1213. Am I to understand that the convents in Great Britain are regulated according to rules different from those of convents of the like order n the Roman States?—I think we are speaking f rules, you in one sense, and I in another. The rules that I speak of are merely rules made or the government and religious training of the nembers of the community, and they do not ouch their property in any way whatever, and ve are only now treating of property; we are ot treating of the religious life apart from roperty.

1214. But I wish to identify the institutions, nd I ask you whether the rules that are appli- able to the various orders which exist both in he Pontifical States and in England, are not he same? — What they are in the Pontifical States I cannot say of my own knowledge; but I should say most certainly not. The original ule of the convent, as I tell you, regards the nternal government, the direction and training f its members, leading them up to that perfection which they seek to reach by associating them- elves in this manner; it does not touch their roperty, for in the Roman States, while some of he convents, I believe, were originally richly endowed, others have no property whatever, but ive entirely upon alms, as anyone might see by walking down the streets there.

1215. But you are a Roman Catholic; does not your Church hold that institutions like colleges, in which persons, the members thereof, are trained for Christian perfection if they re- ceive any gifts, are in the nature of charities?— No, I do not think that it holds anything of the sort.

1216. Mr. Matthews.] I believe that the effect of authorising a convent under the Orders in Council which enable that course to be taken in France is this, that the rule of that convent is publicly enrolled or registered, and that the convent is authorised to hold property as a com- munity, and with perpetual succession?—It is so. The rule must be certified and approved by the ordinary, and then registered.

1218. And then the community is able to hold property with perpetual succession?—Yes; but there was another object in that. It was to secure, or to attempt to secure, a competent maintenance for these establishments, so that they should, not become a burden to the State under adverse circumstances. The Government will not authorise them unless there is a certain amount of property.

1219. Will you listen to the evidence given by Mr. Bagshawe, senior, before the House of Lords in 1857, and tell me whether you agree with it; he is asked this question: "Inasmuch as it is part of the duty of a priest in saying mass to pray for the dead, then if giving money to pray for the dead be giving money for a super- stitious use, giving money for the maintenance of a priest, who must as part of his duty say prayers for the dead, is giving money for a superstitious use?" and Mr. Bagshawe answers, "Just so; I think I may go the length of saying that no priest could receive the benefit of a fund, knowing who the donor was, without holding himself bound, ex necessitate conscientiæ, to say a mass for the donor. I may also add, that it is not merely as to priests, but all night prayers and morning prayers in a family, every private individual's prayers, if they were to follow any prayer book which has ever been published, would involve the same obligation of praying for the dead in those prayers. Even in some instances I have known, particularly in collegiate establishments, that it is added on to the grace at dinner; it per- vades the whole system of the Catholic Church to pray for the dead whenever you have an occa- sion to pray at all;" do you agree with that?— Entirely.

1220. I am not sure that you were quite un- derstood on that point; do you not think that the implied duty of praying for the soul of a donor, if it were acknowledged by the priest who received the gift, and acted upon by him, might be treated by the Court of Chancery as an illegal trust annexed to the gift?—I think the Court of Chancery would distinguish the source from which the obligation arose, whether from the act of the donor (and they would only make it void in that case), or from circumstances which were foreign to the gift.

1221. Assuming any communication between the donor and the priest, by which it appeared that the donor, in making the gift, intended to have the advantage of the prayers which the priest's duty obliges him to offer up, that would invalidate the gift?—It would be void then.

1222. Mr. Gregory.] If it implied a trust?— Yes, or if there was any previous communication to involve a condition.

1223. Mr. Cogan.] You stated, in answer to an honourable Member, that you were anxious that these institutions should be recognised by the State; was I right in understanding you to say, that you merely wished that any exceptional legislation should be removed as against them, and that you did not claim for them any special exemptions, rights, or privileges?—No; I ask none whatever; simply that we may be relieved from disability.

1224. That you may be placed on an equality with any other association, such as a club?— Yes.

1225. And such recognition as that, in your opinion, would give no right to State inspection? —None whatever.

Mr. ALFRED KINGSTON, called in; and Examined.

1226. Chairman.] WHAT is your office?—Senior Clerk in the Public Record Office.

1227. Have you brought any documents with you?—I have brought a portion of a Return which I prepared for Mr. Hadfield, in obedience to an Order of the House.

1228. What is the nature of the Return?—The Return was to show all the enrolments made in the Court of Chancery under the Act of 9 Geo. 2, the Mortmain Act.

1229. Do you mean that you have got a copy of all the enrolments made during that time?—We have prepared a Return of all deeds in which we could find any specification of a trust.

1230. Of a Roman Catholic trust, do you mean?—Of any kind of trust, because the deeds did not quote the Act in question; and the only way in which we thought we could arrive at it at all was, by taking out all deeds in which there was any specification of a trust, and allowing it to be declared afterwards.

1231. This information was prepared for a Return called for by the House for another purpose?—Yes, for another purpose altogether.

1232. And you have attended here to submit that document to this Committee?—I have attended here to show this Return, to see if it might prove serviceable to this Committee; that is to say, I have brought a portion of that Return, to see whether it would afford the information which this Committee required, because it contains, amongst other things, a certain number of deeds, the trust clause of which applies to Roman Catholics. I should also say that, in order to try and help the inquiry, I have sought to make a list of all the enrolments since 1867, 1868, and 1869, in which there was any Catholic trust.

1233. Mr. Newdegate.] Are you in a position to furnish the Committee with the heading of the first Return and a description of your second search made in 1867-68?—I have the Order of the House of Commons as to the Return to be made for Mr. Hadfield; that was the first Return which I mentioned.

1234. Will you be kind enough to read the heading of that Return?—"Return of the Number of Enrolments in the High Court of Chancery, which have been effected in each year and altogether in pursuance of the Act of the 9th year of the reign of King George the Second, chapter 36, up to and inclusive of the year 1865, and stating the references to and particulars of all enactments now in force for effecting exemptions from the necessity of enrolling in the same Court in pursuance of the said Act."

1235. That being the requirement of the House of Commons, how far have you been able to complete that Return?—It is just upon completion; the year 1865 alone remains to be completed.

1236. When do you anticipate that that return will be completed?—It will be presented, I suppose, some time in the course of the next fortnight.

1237. Then you have referred to a subsequent search that you have made, with a view partly to the inquiries of this Committee?—Yes.

1238. Will you give a description of the conditions under which you have made that search?—I took the indexes from the Enrolment Office, and looked in the column of the names of the grantors for such names as I thought were Roman Catholic names. I also looked in the column which declared the nature of the deed, the declaration of trust, namely, and I looked at all of these which I could find with those two conditions, namely, Roman Catholic names, and declaration of trust; and I have prepared a list which I have brought with me.

1239. Can you put that list in?—Yes. (Vide Appendix.)

1240. Chairman.] Is it a Return to be made to the House?—I made it subsequently to seeing a note written by Mr. Newdegate to the Master of the Rolls, desiring that somebody from the Public Record Office should attend to give information of any kind which he could about the subjects of this inquiry.

1241. Mr. Newdegate.] Do you mean a note from me, asking the Master of the Rolls whether any officer of the Rolls Court would be prepared to give evidence before this Committee?—Yes; I was informed of the effect of the note.

1242. Do you put in these documents as having been made in consequence of a search in the Rolls Court?—Yes; but I should also state, that the Rolls themselves have not been examined. This is simply taken from what one could see in the index. Therefore, perhaps, it might not be all touching the enrolment of any particular set of deeds, but it is all that we have been able in a short time to collect from the indexes.

1243. Mr. Cogan.] You stated that you selected deeds in which names which you understood were Catholics' names appeared; may I ask you whether there are any names that exclusively belong to Roman Catholics?—Simply certain titles that belong to Roman Catholics, such as in this document, "The Right Reverend Thomas Grant, of St. George's, Southwark, Roman Catholic Bishop."

1244. That clearly indicates the religion?—Yes.

1245. But you stated that you took the names for your guide; are there any names that are exclusively Catholic?—No; and that makes me say I am not certain that this list would contain all, because it is only certain names that I have been able to identify by the description.

1246. Mr. Matthews.] I understand that not only have you required a designation which was plainly Roman Catholic in the trustees, but that you have only selected those cases in which there was declaration of a Roman Catholic trust also?—Not a declaration of a Catholic trust, because in the indexes made in the Enrolment Office there are simply the words "declaration of trust"; you cannot tell whether it is Roman Catholic or not.

1247. In those cases where you found a trustee named by some title which clearly indicated a Roman Catholic functionary, and where you found that there were Roman Catholic trusts declared, you searched the Rolls?—In those cases, I have made an abstract from the Rolls.

1248. But in the 395 cases spoken of by Mr. Erle, in which there was nothing to indicate any Roman Catholic quality about the trustees, and where there was no declaration of trust, you have not searched the Rolls?—No.

Mr. JAMES CUDDON, called in; and Examined.

1249. Mr. Matthews.] YOU are, I believe, a conveyancer, now at the Bar?—Yes.

1250. And you practised for 25 years or more as a conveyancer below the bar?—I did.

1251. Have you frequently advised men in religious orders as to their pecuniary affairs?—Frequently.

1252. So as to become well acquainted with the manner in which their pecuniary arrangements are generally made?—Certainly.

1253. I believe that for the purpose of this inquiry, you represent all the religious orders of men in this country?—Yes; I do for the purpose of this inquiry. It was considered that it would be better that the solicitors of the various religious orders should instruct one person as to their affairs in any respect in which he might consider it proper to make inquiries, so that one person could give all the information to the Committee that might be required, and I was the individual who was selected.

1254. Then, in that manner, by communication with the solicitors representing different religious communities of men, have you acquired practical acquaintance with the state of their affairs and property?—Yes; and by some communication also with several of the superiors, where I thought it necessary to have it.

1255. Are you in that way enabled to inform the Committee on what terms property enjoyed by them is "held, possessed, and received" in terms of our reference?—Yes; and I shall be prepared to give the Committee every information which I can give them without a breach of confidence on my part.

1257. It is at the pleasure of the different members of the community, that the income of the property is enjoyed for common purposes?—Certainly.

1258. And do I rightly understand you to say that no trust is declared?—No trust of any description.

1259. Who are the legal owners of property that is so enjoyed by these religious orders; is it held by one person, or by several?—Securities for money, or real estate, are held as the private property of two or three individuals, who are joint tenants, on whom no condition or trust whatever is imposed. They could mortgage, sell, or spend it, just like any other owners, if so inclined; and all the members of the order are perfectly aware that those amongst them who have property hold it as absolute owners. It is a perfectly understood thing. They are fully aware of it; there is no mistake about it at all.

1260. With regard to religious men, is there any rule or usage requiring them to bring anything with them when they join the order?—No. In deciding upon whether an applicant for admission into an order can be admitted or not, his virtue, his talent, and his zeal, are considered quite apart from the question of money. A good subject would be admitted just as readily without money as with. It scarcely ever happens that anyone has much; members are sometimes younger sons of the nobility or landed gentry. In such cases, generally, far less is given to them than is given to their brothers in the world; and the same remark will apply to members out of the higher middle classes in life. In a pecuniary point of view, thus in fact families are generally benefited by their brothers becoming religious men. This is perfectly well understood in Catholic families, and it is altogether a popular delusion to suppose that religious orders are enriched at the expense of families; nothing of the kind takes place.

1261. Suppose the case of a man becoming professed, in a religious order, who is then possessed of property of his own, in what way does he deal with that?—Before profession, he disposes of it in whatever manner he pleases, and this is frequently done in favour of his relatives if they are in any need. I should wish to refer you to a little anecdote in the life of the celebrated Père Ravignon, where you will find that, previously previously to his profession, he went to a notaire, and ordered a deed of conveyance to be made out to his brother of the entire amount of his property; and after paying the notaire's fee, he had a louis d'or in his pocket, and as he left the chamber of the notaire, he found a poor man to whom he gave the louis d'or, and he said, "Now, I can enter my community without a sous," which he thought a great thing to do.

1262. Profession involves the necessity of a vow of poverty, does it not?—Yes, certainly; that is to say, the person does not use the property for himself.

1264. The retention of any property by a man himself would be inconsistent with that vow, would it not?—Yes.

1265. As a matter of practice, is it not, therefore, required of a man before he becomes professed, that he should denude himself of what property he possessed?—Yes; it is the invariable rule that he gives up all property before profession. He may do so to his relatives or for charitable purposes, or for whatever purposes he thinks proper.

1266. But whatever property he possesses he must denude himself of it all before he is admitted to profession?—Certainly.

1267. Does that rule in religious orders apply as well to reversions that happen to be vested in the individual, as to property actually in possession?—In case an eldest son enters the religious life, it is the universal practice to renounce, before profession, his inheritance, reserving only to himself a small annuity; no profession can take place without that, and if anything falls to a religious man after profession, by inheritance, then he is obliged by the rule to allow it to pass over his head to the next heir; and to effect this he executes a legal deed, which is always done. So that, in point of fact, supposing (we will say for the sake of argument) that the next brother of any peer was now a religious man, and his brother died without a child, so that he became next heir, he would immediately make a deed of gift to his next brother, passing himself over altogether. Of course he could not divest himself of his necessary dignity, but every shilling, with the exception of a trifling annuity, perhaps 100 l. a year, or something of that kind, would be given over to the next brother.

1268. Just let me try and make it more intelligible to the Committee why that is. In the old state of things, before the Reformation, profession by a religious man involved by law civil death, did it not?—Yes, certainly.

1269. And the consequence of that civil death was precisely what you have described, that inheritance passed over the heads of religious men?—Certainly; and practically the same thing results now.

1270. Practically the religious orders impose upon their members the obligation of doing that by deed which formerly the spirit of the order, aided by the law of the country, effected of itself?—Certainly.

1271. Is that the invariable rule?—That is the invariable rule of religious life amongst men.

1273. That sort of legacy is a case that rarely arises?—Very rarely. As a general rule, it is considered that persons who have become professed have no further occasion for money, and very few people unfortunately leave these gentlemen anything after profession.

1274. You said that the property of which these religious communities enjoyed the benefit, is legally vested both at law and in equity in joint tenants?—Yes.

1275. How is it transmitted from one set of joint tenants to others?—If a person possessed of property desires to part with his power over it, he does so by a deed of gift which is prepared and perfected in a legal manner, and on which, of course, the regular and proper stamp duty is paid; and in the event of such a person dying without having executed any deed of gift, leaving a joint tenant surviving, it goes to him, and in that case the succession duty is paid by the surviving joint tenant or joint tenants; but if a person dies solely possessed, then the property is transmitted according to law, without any regard to the fact of his having been a religious man, and the ordinary duties are paid as in any other case, by the people who take the property, and the revenue does not suffer the loss of a single penny.

1276. The result of it all is, therefore, that the property which is enjoyed by these communities is held absolutely by certain persons as owners both at law and in equity?—It is impossible that it could be held on trust, because there are clauses of the Catholic Emancipation Act which are so clear that it would be absurd to attempt to create a trust in favour of a religious order of men, and no lawyer would attempt it.

1278. Are the joint tenants selected to hold property of which, in fact, the religious orders have the enjoyment, generally members of the orders or not?—As a general rule they are members of the orders, but I individually know of some cases in which they are not members of the orders.

1279. Chairman.] But they would have some relation to the inmates of the monastery, would they not?—No, not necessarily relations, but persons in whose honour every reliance can be placed. Fortunately there are lots of men in the world of that kind.

1280. Mr. Matthews.] I do not propose to go into the matter of enrolment, about which we have had a great deal of evidence already, but do you concur with what other witnesses have told us, that there is nothing in fact to enrol in the case of property belonging to religious communities?—I think that you will find, if you look at our Directory for the year 1860, that at that time there were only about 700 churches or chapels chapels in all in England; out of that number many were of modern creation: catholicity had then begun to revive, and to none of those modern missions would any charity funds attach. As to the old chapels very few had charities attached; and I can only say, speaking for myself (and I have had a considerable amount of experience in that way), that it is surprising to me that, considering the 300 years of disaster to the Catholic Church in England, there were so many as 400 cases to register shortly after the passing of that Act of 1860.

1281. In your judgment, so far as you know of these matters, the deeds which Mr. Erle spoke of as registered soon after the Act of 1860 would represent pretty well all the Catholic charities in existence?—I believe all; if any were omitted it was by pure accident. Of course, any funds held by persons, members of conventual or monastic institutions, are not charities, and therefore there was nothing to register as far as they are concerned, inasmuch as they are not charities at all.

1283. I believe you have prepared a statement as to the property that is enjoyed by these monastic bodies, in order to enable the Committee fully to understand the way in which it is possessed and held?—As I wish to give a perfectly correct and truthful, straightforward statement to the Committee (if I could not do that I would give none at all), I have taken a great deal of pains to collect the information, and, with the permission of the Chairman, I will read a very short and concise statement of the state of affairs as it now exists with reference to all the property of religious men in this country. Firstly, there are 10 colleges, conducted, by permission of the legal owners, by ecclesiastics who are supposed to belong to religious orders; of course, in the face of the tendencies of the Catholic Emancipation Act, I must talk of them as persons "supposed to belong to religious orders."

1284. Chairman.] These are colleges for education?—Yes, but conducted by religious men. There are about 2,032 acres of land in all, held with these 10 colleges by permission of the legal owners. This land is required and used for the purpose of supplying the persons inhabiting these colleges with various articles of produce; for the colleges being generally at some distance from towns, farming in some cases becomes almost a necessity. At these 10 colleges there are now about 1,192 students of the higher class and higher middle class, who receive a first-rate classical education under the care of preceptors of the highest attainments, who are supposed to belong to religious orders. These preceptors enjoy no emolument whatever for their services, which services are rendered solely from motives of religion under the impression that it is a great and good work to devote themselves to the education of these classes of young gentlemen. The advantage of this system to the Catholic laity is very great, because by reason of the preceptors undertaking the work as religious men, the pensions are small, only 40 l., 50 l., or 60 l. a year generally, and even in the schools of philosophy, with private apartments, only about 100 l. a year. The appliances are first-rate, the mode of living excellent, with every attention to the health and comfort of the pupils; and these colleges thus present advantages to the Catholic laity in point of education equal to any that are attainable in Protestant colleges in this country at a much higher cost. Country situations for colleges are chosen not from any desire to possess land, but on account of health, and the great difficulty and expense of obtaining space in towns. There are also 430 acres held by colleges, but at present let, and which have been acquired partly in view of the probable increase of establishment, and consequent necessity for more land for building purposes, and partly perhaps to a small extent under the apprehension of annoyance, if these acres should be in the hands of strangers. These colleges and lands are held by individuals as absolute owners, without any trust imposed on them, and they permit the occupation of this property for the purposes before mentioned, during their will and pleasure. There are in the whole country 151 houses and parochial residences, three-fourths of which are occupied by only one or two persons supposed to be religious, and these gentlemen have under their spiritual care in the whole 278,850 souls, and 92,260 poor children in various poor schools.

1285. What do you mean by "houses"?—That is to say, distinguishing houses from parochial residences in this way, that there may be a house for religious men to which no cure of souls is attached. There are only about 30 houses of that description; the whole of the others are, in fact, missionary houses.

1286. Mr. Matthews.] That leaves, therefore, 121 as parochial residences?—Certainly.

1287. Are those residences to which the cure of souls of some particular district or parish is attached?—Certainly.

1288. So that to that extent the Roman Catholic laity of England are dependent on religious men for parochial and spiritual ministration?—Entirely.

1289. In fact, could the parochial work of the country be carried on without them?—It would be utterly impossible without having a great importation of foreign priests.

1290. The number of secular priests in the country is wholly insufficient to meet the wants of the Roman Catholic population?—Quite; that is the reason why there are so many religious men in the missions.

1291. Now will you proceed with your statement?—These houses and parochial residences, with any churches or chapels attached thereto, are held by individuals as their own absolute property in the same way as the colleges and lands attached thereto?—The only other real estate enjoyed by persons who may be supposed to be religious men throughout the entire country is about 1,600 acres, hardly so much, I think, with some houses situate in divers localities, also held by individuals as their own absolute property in the same way as the colleges and lands attached thereto. And, lastly, there are about 500 boys in reformatories under the spiritual care of religious men, and may I add that many thousands of poor people (without any reference to their religious belief, I am quite sure) are annually fed and relieved in various ways at some of these houses.

1292. Now, with respect to personal property; is there any accumulation of personal property in the hands of religious men?—The income from personal estate of every description enjoyed by all the religious orders united is very small compared to the important and numerous objects to which it has to be devoted; such objects very shortly being, firstly, the maintenance of many sick and old religious men who are now unable to attend to any ecclesiastical duty; secondly, principally, the education of numerous church students for about 120 parishes in England; also for Demerara, Jamaica, Honduras, Bombay, Bengal, Madras, and the colonies under the English Crown, whose services are admitted frequently by the Government to be of very great value, and for which there is nothing else to depend upon, and also in preparing teachers for colleges.

1293. You mean that the cost of education of all those foreign missionaries is defrayed out of property in the hands of these religious men?—Out of any personal income that there may be belonging to these religious men; they allowed it to be defrayed out of it. Then, again, there are divers persons too old to work, or disabled servants, who are always taken great care of and maintained. Then, again, great assistance is rendered towards the repairs of the different parochial residences, churches, chapels, and schools served by these religious men. Very often such assistance is absolutely necessary, for sometimes the congregation is exceedingly poor, and is unable to do anything of consequence towards such repairs. Then, again, there are divers expenses attending the repairs of the colleges, which are sometimes very large buildings, and taxes of various kinds. In fact, the total annual income that is available for all these various purposes would, unless the greatest economy were everywhere exercised, be wholly insufficient; and the result is practically that all the members of every order (save only those who are disabled, either from age, infirmity, or ill-health, and saving a very few whose destiny is not missionary work,) do missionary work, and attend to all the duties of parochial clergymen, and are dependent for their support upon the contributions generally given by congregations to parochial clergy, and have no other income whatever. These contributions are insufficient in many cases, and the result is that no money whatever is accumulated, and if, in any case, by any chance, there should be any surplus by reason of any little legacy, or anything of that kind, it is immediately expended in some good work, such as an addition to a church, building a poor school, or something of that kind, or some object which is considered advantageous for the scholars at the colleges; for instance, they would think nothing of spending 1,000 l. for a telescope if it were wanted for an observatory at one of the colleges; but not a penny would be spent by these gentlemen on themselves for their own personal benefit.

1294. Do they all give their property in that way, upon the understanding that it shall not be devoted to their own personal advantage?—The vow of poverty does not mean sordid poverty, that they shall beg in the streets; but that they shall live in the most economical way possible consistently with their character of gentlemen, for they are all gentlemen; men of the highest education, and many of them persons belonging to the best families of the land.

1296. You have described a considerable sphere of usefulness, so far as the Roman Catholic laity are concerned; in your judgment, are the penal clauses attaching to the life of religious men in England considered a grievance by the Roman Catholic laity as well as by themselves?—Well, I would only ask the Committee to refer to several sections of the Catholic Emancipation Act, say sections 28, 29, 30, 31, 33, 34, 35, and 36; and I would ask the Chairman and honourable Members of the Committee, whether those sections do not amount, in fact, to this; that gentlemen taking a religious vow are, in reality, treated, as to some, like ticket-of-leave men, and as to others, as common criminals. Now that is the effect, I submit, of those sections of the Act of Parliament; and (speaking for myself, and not pretending to represent the Catholic laity, of course), I would say that I cannot imagine that any Catholic can consider those sections as otherwise than most offensive, in fact insulting, towards himself as well as towards his friends. These religious men are, many of them, members of the first families of the country, as I have said before, and it is a state of things that must be looked upon as a most terrible grievance.

1297. Is there a practical grievance also in the inability to create any trusts for even the commonest purposes of maintenance?—Certainly there is; because supposing these gentlemen who hold this property as absolute owners were disposed to divest themselves of that ownership, and to give it for the permanent establishment of colleges, or charities conducted by religious men, or for the support of religious men, they cannot do it by law; these clauses alone make it quite illegal.

1298. The colleges you have spoken of, I suppose, prevent what was so much complained of formerly — namely, the education of English Catholics abroad?—Yes, if it were not for those colleges hundreds of young men would be educated abroad, which we, the laity, should consider very undesirable. We like our own country, and much prefer that they should be educated here.

1299. Do you think it desirable that the law should alter that state of things, so that there might be a declaration of trust?—I think it right that there should be a permission to declare trusts, so that those persons who consider it desirable might avail themselves of that permission.

1300. Do you think it an undesirable state of things that such an institution as a college should be absolutely dependent on the goodwill or honour of some individual?—Theoretically it would be so, but speaking personally I myself should have no kind of doubt of the honour of any of these gentlemen.

1301. It is a precarious tenure?—It might be considered with some persons to be better that it should be held legally.

1302. The law prevents any trust in favour of religious men?—Yes.

1303. And therefore a trust in favour of a college to be conducted by religious men, a college, for instance, held by Jesuits or Benedictines, would be an illegal trust?—It might be so considered, and no one would run the risk of it.

1304. If the existence of the college were bound up with the existence of the religious order, it would strike at that just as much as at the order?—Yes.

1305. I am not going in detail into the matter of superstitious uses; but do you concur with what other witnesses have said, that that head of the law also acts harshly with reference to these religious communities of men?—If there is one point point more than another, upon which Catholics feel most strongly, it is with reference to their dead; that they are prevented from having prayers in perpetuity for the dead; it is one of the practices of the Catholic faith to which the utmost importance is attached.

1306. If the Catholics look in that way upon the present state of the law, I may, without impropriety, ask you as a lawyer, what, in your judgment, would remove anything that may reasonably be complained of in the present state of the law?—First of all, I think, that all those sections of the Catholic Emancipation Act, which I have referred to, should be at once expunged; and that all the laws regarding these superstitious uses, as they are called, should be expunged, and then I think also, that exemptions to the Mortmain Act should be extended, so as to allow persons of all religions, whether Catholics or Dissenters, to devise property to their colleges and institutions in the same manner as it may be devised to Protestant institutions now.

1308. And in your judgment dissenting places of education should enjoy the same privileges of exemption?—Catholic and Dissenting. We look upon our Stonyhurst, Oscott, and Ushaw, just in the same light as Protestants do upon their Cambridge, Oxford, and Eton, and we regard our colleges just as they do those. Supposing that the Mortmain Act said you may leave property to Oxford and not to Cambridge, what would Cambridge men do? They would start up and say, "What! not leave it to Cambridge? We ought to have the same privileges as Oxford;" and we Catholics say the same thing for ourselves.

1309. Do you think that those changes in the law would remove every reasonable ground of complaint, without asking for any special privilege for Catholics?—We do not want any privilege any more than other people.

1310. Simply that penal and exceptional legislation should be done away with?—Yes. This is a country in which there is an immense variety of religious opinions; I know of no country in the world in which there is so great a variety of religious opinions in the community, and it appears to me that there should be no distinction in the law in these respects, but that what a Protestant is able to do with his property, a Catholic should be able to do with his, or a Baptist or a Wesleyan, or anybody else with his.

1311. Mr. Jessel.] Have you any objection to give us some idea of the number of religious men in England?—That did not appear to us to be within the scope of the inquiry at all; and I should not feel justified in entering into that question, as to the number of religious men. I thought the inquiry was with reference to their property.

1312. I ask the question with a view to get an answer, which we have got from Mr. Harting, as regards the women; that is, with respect to the amount of property held per head; I want a similar answer, if you can give me one, with respect to the men?—I wish to do everything that I can, consistently with what I consider to be my duty to my friends, these religious men, whom I am proud to call my friends, to meet the views of the right honourable Chairman. With regard to the number, I really cannot speak as to that. I cannot now cast up, and all that sort of thing; and not only that, but looking at the way in which the law now stands, those sections of the Act of Parliament, and the penalties (which the honourable Member very properly seems to treat with not any very great dread; still there is the law), I take it that it would meet, to a great extent, if not entirely, the views of the Chairman, if I were to tell you the total annual income which is possessed for all the purposes which I have described by the religious orders I have spoken of; and if that would equally suit your purpose, I shall be happy to state it. The total annual income derivable from personal estate of every description held by all the members of the different orders, for all the purposes which I described in answer to the question put to me, is 10,350 l. per annum, and no more; that is the sum total; and the smallness of the amount is very easily accounted for, because whenever these gentlemen get a little money it is immediately spent in some beautiful church, or some poor school, or some addition to a college; there is never any accumulation; the money does not rust in their pockets, but is spent at once in some good work or another, and they just keep enough to be enabled to support those gentlemen who are old, and sick, and ill; to keep old disabled servants, and that sort of thing; and to educate young men for Demerara and Bombay, and other English possessions; and to be able to give a little assistance to those missions which are unable to support themselves. There is no surplus of any kind; it is a perfect delusion to suppose that there is; there is nothing of the sort.

1313. As I understand you, that is the total income of the personal estate, and you have already given us the quantity of land?—I have given you, and as I believe given you truly, the quantity of land.

1314. With reference to practical grievances, have you ever heard of anybody enforcing, or attempting to enforce, these penalties?—Certainly not; but I look upon it thus: it is something like your holding a bond over my head which you can enforce if you like. It is a very unpleasant thing to be subject to these penalties. I admit at once that, practically speaking, nothing of the kind has ever been attempted. I look upon it as an affront to us Catholics that such things should remain upon the Statute Book. I do not pretend to say for a moment that they have ever been attempted to be enforced; I simply speak of them as existing penal laws which are to us, sentimentally, highly offensive.

1315. As regards property, is there any practical grievance; have you ever heard of any instance of breach of faith in the persons who hold this property?—Never one.

1316. There is no practical evil, I mean; but it is a sentimental evil?—It is a sentimental evil, certainly. It appears to me to be better that there should be a permissive power of declaring a trust. I have not laid much stress upon that; I have distinctly disclaimed doing so; the religious orders are composed of gentlemen who have the most implicit confidence in one another, and as far as they are concerned, I do not think that they attach the slightest importance to it. We, the laity, or some of us, may attach more importance to it than they do; I admit that there is no practical grievance in it.

1317. Will you answer this hypothetical question: supposing that Parliament were to repeal all those (I will say) ineffectual provisions, and were to substitute for them restrictive, but enforceable provisions as regards superintendence, and so on, which lawyers could enforce, would you prefer that to the present law?—What do you mean by superintendence, if I may ask you?

1318. You know what the theory is in foreign countries as regards orders of men, and that there are very strong restrictions?—But we are Englishmen, and love our country.

1319. I ask you whether you would rather leave matters as they are, or run the risk of enforceable restrictions?—It must depend upon what the restrictions are.

1320. Chairman.] Will you allow me to suggest that you have stated yourself that you are under religious restrictions such as no other religious bodies in this country are under; now they are all within the purview of our law, and if there is any mal-administration, it can be brought under the cognisance of the law; but in consequence of its being supposed that these Catholic trusts are void from their nature, they are never brought before the courts; and the question I think points to this, whether you would prefer these properties being held on honour, or that they should be held like the property of other religious bodies, and be subject to the law of the country?—As to those persons who prefer that their property should still be held upon honour, let it be held upon honour; and as to those who prefer to take advantage of any opportunity of registration, and the attendant consequences, let them do it. There may be some who would much prefer to hold the property in their own hand. I can imagine reasons for that; for instance, supposing that the property is registered for a particular purpose, there would be great difficulty if it was wanted to be applied for any other purpose. It might be a very serious thing; a state of circumstances might arise which might render it desirable to change the nature of the purposes; but then they would be prevented from doing that if it were made a trust for those purposes. For instance, supposing that a state of things should arise in which it should be desirable to use these colleges simply for ecclesiastical students, instead of for students of the world, there would be a very great difficulty if funds were given for one purpose, and they wanted to apply them to another. One can only say this, that although practically there has been no grievance in this respect, and no one person has ever been found amongst these religious orders to misappropriate one single farthing, yet still there are some persons who would prefer that it should be under the law, particularly in cases where there was no intention whatever of changing the application of the property.

1321. But misappropriation, I think, rather conveys an idea not in question now; but having reference to what you said just now, that whereas a donor or testator had given or bequeathed the property for one purpose, it might appear to the trustees or persons who held the property in honour, that it might be diverted to another purpose, cy-près if you please, but different from what the donor intended; I think you state that no question has arisen of that sort?—Not that I am aware of; and I think that I should have heard of any if it had arisen.

1322. I believe a case has been stated in evidence before a Committee of the House of Commons where that occurred; the donor gave the property to support the ministry in a particular parish, but it appeared to the bishop that that property might be better employed in supporting a mission in Liverpool?—But I am speaking of religious men; I am not speaking of the clergy generally.

1323. You are speaking of the law, as it affects the Catholics at present?—All my attention has been directed to this question of religious men.

1324. Mr. Jessel.] You said something about a difference between Roman Catholic charities and the charities of other religions in this country; I am not aware of any difference, except the old exception of the Mortmain Act with regard to the then established, and we may say, national institutions?—I think you will find that there are other exemptions that have been added from time to time.

1325. I am not aware of any religious charities?—Not religious.

1327. Is that a fact, except as far as regards those ancient colleges, which for certain purposes are excepted; can a Protestant endow a new college in any different way from a Roman Catholic?—As far as executing a deed goes, that is a different thing; I am speaking of making a will.

1328. Is there any difference (I am not aware of it) as regards favour between, for instance, a Wesleyan and a Catholic?—No; I do not think that there is as regards a Wesleyan and a Catholic.

1329. Is there, in this respect, any difference, with the exception of these specified institutions, of a very ancient date, between the Church of England and the Wesleyans or Roman Catholics?—I do not know whether there is. I can only say, speaking for myself, that I think a Catholic ought to be allowed to leave property to his college just as a Protestant should be allowed to leave property to his college.

1330. But assuming it to be the law that a Protestant cannot?—But he can.

1331. A Protestant Dissenter cannot; would your opinion be in favour of a change of the law to allow everybody to leave property, or merely that Roman Catholics should be on exactly the same footing as the Protestants?—I think that Protestants, Roman Catholics, and Dissenters ought to be exactly on the same footing as regards their power to leave property; that there should be no distinction whatever; that is my opinion.

1332. Assuming for a moment that that is the present state of the law, you do not require any alteration in that respect?—No; assuming it to be the present state of the law.

1333. Assuming that Parliament should strike out the exceptions from the Mortmain Act, that would meet your views?—Yes.

1334. Do I rightly understand you to represent to the Committee that the Roman Catholics feel it as a grievance that they have not the same testamentary power to leave property to these institutions that is possessed as regards other communities?—I have not spoken for the Catholic community; I am merely speaking as an individual;

dividual; I have no doubt that hundreds and ousands of Catholics feel as I do upon that subct, but I am not authorised to say what Catho:s generally feel. Speaking for myself, I said, for xample, that Stonyhurst, or Oscott, or Ushaw are us as your Oxford, or Cambridge, or Eton are you, and therefore if you can leave property to our Oxford, Cambridge, or Eton, we ought to e able to leave property in the same way to our tonyhurst, Oscott, and Ushaw.

1335. Those exceptions relate to ancient instiitions, and do not apply to modern institutions, ther of the Church of England or Protestant issenters; the law is the same for all religions, it not, in this respect?—But it is exactly those ry exceptions that I think are unfair; merely ecause they are ancient, they ought not to be xceptions, and they were ours once, you know.

1336. If those exceptions were struck out of ie Mortmain Act, it would be all right?—As r as I am prepared to say, it would; but I did ot come prepared to give information upon that oint.

1337. What I mean is this, would you prefer triking the exceptions out of the Statute of Jortmain, or would you prefer instituting a law roviding for further exceptions?—I would have urther exceptions. I think that it is the right ing to allow people to leave property for colleges nd things of that kind, great national works. t is sure never to be done to any such extent as o do any harm; at least, I should regard that as ost improbable.

1339. I mean does it come within your notion f the word "charity"?—They are not charities, f course.

1340. Then if they are not charities at present ccording to our notions of the law, there ought o be no other perpetuity allowed, ought there?—If you treat them as charities, and have them nrolled as public bodies, people ought to be able o leave property to them.

1341. As I understand you, although not harities, you would make an exception in avour of religious communities which are not harities by law?—As an individual Catholic, I hink that we ought not to be prevented from hose things; but I simply say, generally speakng, that whatever a Protestant is enabled to do vith his property by law, with reference to any nstitution with which he is connected, so Catholics and Dissenters should be able to do with theirs.

1342. Do not suppose that I am differing with ou in that proposition; but I want to call your ttention to this, that by law no one, be his religion what it may, can leave property in perpetuity except for charitable objects?—Yes, that is so.

1343. You have told us that the objects of hese associations, with the exception of teaching, nd so forth, which would be charitable objects, re not charities, and still you tell us that it is a grievance that you cannot by will or deed devote roperty to these objects: now is not that claiming a privilege for these bodies which is not enjoyed by others?—I do not want to claim any privileges. As far as my own feeling is concerned, I should be just as satisfied if I had any money to leave in that way in leaving it now, as I should under any law. I did not come prepared to enter into that part of the question. If I had been informed that it was wished that I should consider the state of the law in that respect, I should have come better prepared.

1344. What I want to know is, what you think a grievance; do you think it a grievance that your community should be deprived of a power of doing that which is not at present allowed to any other community?—Yes, I do; I say that Protestants can do things that we cannot do.

1345. With the exception of those ancient colleges, what other things are there in which Protestants have an advantage?—Colleges are a most important exception.

1346. With the exception of those portions of Roman Catholic properties which have been decided in modern times to come under the doctrine of superstitious uses, is there any other subject of complaint?—There has been a great deal of complaint of late years as regards prisons and workhouses.

1347. I mean complaint as regards the devolution of property?—No, I think not.

1348. Chairman.] I think we understand you to say that any property which is bequeathed or given for a charitable purpose (charitable purposes including all those purposes which we have heard named here) is good at law as regards Catholics?—In personal estate.

1349. For any purpose such as that of education, or relief of the poor, and all those purposes that are enumerated in the particular statute professing to define what is charity, property could be taken by deed or will by Catholics?—Yes, certainly.

1350. The exception alone is said to be for what is called a superstitious use?—Yes.

1351. And that is the only limit to any bequest or donation of property to any of these colleges?—I believe so.

1352. Mr. Matthews.] If the charitable purpose is to be executed by a religious man, one having taken the prohibited vows, it would then be illegal?—Yes.

1353. Chairman.] That question has been put before to a witness, as to whether it was the person who administered the charity, or the purpose of the charity, that made it illegal, and I think I understood the witness before to state, that if the purpose was innocent, there is not necessarily any inquiry to the persons who administer it, but that if the charity was confined to administration by an illegal body that made it void?—Yes.

1354. It does not follow, if the purpose is innocent, that because those who administer it live in monasteries or convents, therefore it would be void?—No; but it is very unsatisfactory to have all kinds of doubt thrown upon things of that sort. It is right that the law should be put into a perfectly intelligible state, in order that no difficulties may occur; one man will give you one opinion, and another man another opinion, and it is very unsatisfactory.

1355. It would come to this, that you object to any order of men being pointed at by the law as a body or order of men that should not exist?—Yes.

1357. That is the policy founded upon experience, rience, or presumed experience of mischief done, and you contend that there is no mischief done?—That, on the contrary, great good is done by it.

1358. And you contend that that law is oppressive?—Highly oppressive, and contrary to freedom in this country.

1359. I do not think that this is the only country where such a prohibition has existed?—I am quite aware of that, but because other countries do what is wrong, that is no reason why this country should follow them.

1360. Mr. Matthews.] Are you aware of any country where a vow is made penal?—No.

1361. Chairman.] Are you aware of any country in Europe where, during a certain part of the last century, the Jesuits have not been disallowed?—If not allowed, they have been there, so that the law has not been put in force.

1362. Have they not been expelled from Catholic countries?—In Catholic countries, or so-called Catholic countries, from which these religious gentlemen have been expelled, it has always been done by revolutionists; the next thing has been the king; and then the gentry. It has been done by secret society men, revolutionists, socialists; they hate you just as much as they do us.

1363. The term "revolutionist" would not apply to the Emperor of Austria, would it?—Not to himself, but to a great many of his people. I have no doubt that the thing was brought about by some of the men of whom I speak.

1364. It was at the time of the empire in Austria that the Jesuits were prohibited, was it not?—But what came afterwards?

1365. Mr. Matthews.] Do you know any legislation in which the mere spiritual act of taking a vow is made penal?—I do not; and if it did exist anywhere else, that is no reason why it should exist in free England. Englishmen have great freedom, and I think that Catholics ought to have the same freedom that other Englishmen have.

1366. Mr. Jessel.] We are going out of our line; but do you consider a law prohibiting undue restrictions of freedom to be necessarily opposed to freedom; is there not another view to be taken of it also?—There may be a great many views to be taken; men look at things in different lights altogether. I am entirely in favour of real freedom, not of licentiousness.

1367. You told us, just now, your views about a charity; is it your opinion, as a lawyer, that a gift of land, with the purpose of founding a college, with the superadded direction that the teachers of that college should be members of a religious order, would be necessarily void?—I do not say that it would be necessarily void; but I say that it is considered, in practice, so doubtful, that no one would think of attempting it. I entirely agree with Mr. Bagshawe. I think that he expounded the law in a manner which every one could very well understand. He said that many points were doubtful, and that other points were perfectly plain. I quite agree with what he said in that respect. People do not like to run such risks, you know. By some chance, the Court might take a different view, and your object be entirely defeated. Why not make the law clear and plain? Either that we can or that we cannot; one or the other.

1368. As regards, I will not say, the property of these institutions, but the property the income of which is devoted to these institutions, do you, as a lawyer, consider that evidence of the kind I will mention, brought before a court of equity would, or would not, be sufficient to establish a trust; suppose you show that for the last 50 years the real estate has been handed from joint tenants to joint tenants, and that uniformly during that period the income has been devoted for the purpose of the maintenance of a particular college, or a particular hospital; would not a court of equity, assuming that there was nothing illegal in the trust, hold that to be sufficient evidence of a trust?—Yes, it might be so; but the question is whether it could be shown that the property had always been so appropriated; it would not at all follow that it had.

1369. I put the assumption to you that it could?—I daresay that it might be so held under some circumstances; it is impossible to say. But, as a general rule, if it is merely the bent and impulse of a man's mind to employ property in a particular manner, until he has executed some declaration of trust which is final, he is not considered bound.

1370. Take the case which I put of property held in that way by a succession of joint tenants for half a century, and suppose it was proved in evidence that during all that time the income had been applied to, we will say, a charitable purpose, in support of a hospital or college for education; I am putting it to you as a lawyer, whether that would not be treated in a court of equity as sufficient evidence of a trust?—I daresay it might.

1371. Assuming the trust to be legal, would not that be enforced against a joint tenant who attempted to use that property for other purposes?—Yes, assuming that state of facts to exist.

1372. Assuming it to be a legal purpose intended, do you mean to say that a court of equity would allow any one of these joint tenants who derive the property simply by conveyance from prior joint tenants, to divert the property as he chose?—You assume that the rents have always been applied to that purpose, but very likely in the case of religious men it would not be so at all, because the money would go into one bag, and you could not earmark it: you could not do that, but if you could, that would be the way in which it would be decided.

1373. When you say that the property held for the benefit of the institution is the absolute property of the individuals, you mean supposing the trust to be illegal?—No; I say that they have perfect power, if they like, to divert it to any other purpose which they think proper; and they are neither bound in law nor in honour, nor in conscience, to keep up any particular college or place; if they wished to change from London to Jamaica they could do so, or if they wished to change from a secular college to an ecclesiastical college they could do so; there is no such obligation amongst religious bodies, as you suppose.

1374. But you know that the moment a man is bound in honour to apply the proceeds of property to some purpose, not for his own benefit, and if that purpose is a perfectly legal one, so that there is something more than honour, that could be enforced, could it not?—Yes; but these very persons would be the persons who would have to do that themselves.

1375. Let me put it to you in another way: supposing that the trustees of a religious house (supposing the religious house were valid) could be be shown to have used a property not for their own benefit but for the benefit of the religious house for a great many years past, and had acquired that property without will from certain other persons, have you any doubt, as a lawyer, that that would be a trust?—Supposing you could prove all that, that might be sufficient.

1376. It is only in the case where a trust is illegal that you cannot enforce it, is it not?—These things have not generally existed, you know, for 40 or 50 years, or any such period.

1377. I put a strong case to you, but there may be of course sufficient evidence with regard to a less period: supposing that you made the religious houses of men legal to-morrow, so that there was no objection on that score, have you any doubt that with such evidence as I have alluded to, a court of equity would prevent the nominal owners of that property from appropriating it to their own benefit?—I daresay, supposing that those penal clauses were annulled so that trusts of that description would become legal, there may be some circumstances in which a trust might be held to have taken place, and to have been proved.

1378. Mr. Newdegate.] You state that you appear here as the agent representing the religious communities of men in this country, and by "religious persons," I conceive that you mean the same as is meant by the word réligieux, abroad, and that they are the regular orders?—Virtually, you may say that they are.

1379. The religious orders have been modified, and different regulations in some respects adopted with respect to them, since the commencement of this century?—I do not know what alterations have been made since the commencement of this century. These gentlemen regulate their own affairs. I do not say that any alterations have been made, or that they have not been made; I ask, how is it possible for me to know that, or anybody, except one of the members themselves?

1380. But you understand that these gentlemen are bound by the organisation of their several orders?—Their consciences are bound; there is no obligation in point of law. Their vows impose no obligation in point of law; they are merely registered in heaven, that is all; nowhere else. In this country there is nothing of the kind.

1381. And also registered in the central depôt of the order?—I do not know of any central depôt of the order at all.

1382. Are you not aware that these orders are represented by some official at Rome?—No, I am not aware of anything of the kind; and supposing it to be the fact, I see nothing in it.

1383. I only ask you whether you are aware of it?—No, I am not aware of anything of the sort; on the contrary, I believe that many are not represented by anybody at Rome. Some may be; others, I am quite sure, are not.

1384. Are you quite sure that some are represented in no way at Rome?—I have not read all the rules; I really speak there my own individual opinion.

1385. When, therefore, you asserted a little while ago that these are free Englishmen, you could not have made that assertion, I presume, without reference to the obligations which constitute the order?—There are no obligations on the order which militate in the slightest degree against the duties of Englishmen, I am quite sure.

1386. Then you are conversant to a certain degree with the regulations?—I do not say that I am cognisant of the regulations; I say that I feel quite sure.

1387. That is only a general impression?—That is a general impression. That is the answer which I gave you. If your impression is that they are, my impression is that they are not.

1388. Your impression is, that there is no system of organisation and of discipline prevalent in most of these orders recognised by the same names, in different parts of Europe?—They are recognised by the same names in different parts of Europe, but it does not at all follow that they are not quite independent of one another.

1389. Do you mean that the several branches of these orders, as established in different countries, are independent of each other?—I think probably it is so.

1390. Are you aware that it is?—I believe that it is so.

1391. What is your reason for your belief?—Simply from a general observation during the last 30 years during which I have been acquainted with these gentlemen; I never heard of anything of the kind.

1392. But are you aware, coming to a period within 30 years, that there has been a considerable change in the relation of the religious orders and the property held by them effected under the authority of the brief of 1850?—What brief do you mean?

1393. Letters Apostolic issued in that year?—That has nothing to do with English law in any shape or way.

1394. I think it fair to warn you that there is evidence before the Committee of 1851-52 that it had a very powerful effect on the disposition of property in England held by members of the Church of Rome, and especially by priests; you are not aware of that?—It might affect the minds of persons, but there is no legal effect of any description. People might be influenced in their intentions by a brief which came from Rome, but it would have no legal force whatever in this country any more than if you were to issue a brief.

1395. And the reason of that is that a statute has been passed prohibiting the effect of that brief?—No foreign power has any right whatever to regulate the law of property of England.

1396. Then you do not concur with the witnesses in 1851, who declared that the effect of that brief would be to subject property in this country to a foreign authority?—I do not know anything about the evidence given in 1851; I simply state broadly that no brief from Rome or anywhere else can have any legal effect upon any property in England.

1397. Do you mean by its not having legal effect, that if it is not recognised by English law it would not have legality according to English law?—I mean what the word conveys, that it has no legal effect. If a man chooses of his own free will to do a thing in a certain manner, he is not, for that reason, obliged to do it; he may if he likes, or he may not. Our laws are not affected by anything that comes from Rome.

1398. That is to say, a man may do as he likes provided that he is not restrained by the law?—Certainly, with property in England.

1399. I think that you expressed strong disapproval of the law against Mortmain which is the English law?—No, I have not expressed any disapproval of it; I have said, on the contrary, that the exemptions ought to be extended to us.

1400. If you said that the exemptions ought to be extended to you, then you disapprove of the restraints? — Yes, I disapprove of our being restrained any more than other persons are, any more than Protestants are.

1401. I think that, in speaking of your colleges (and I believe you have instanced those of Oscott, Stonyhurst and Ushaw), you said that they ought to be no more restrained by the law against Mortmain, than Oxford and Cambridge? —That is my individual opinion; I think so.

1402. And you stated strongly that that was a grievance to you?—In my opinion it is.

1403. You are speaking as the representative of the religious communities generally in this country?—Not on that point, because I never intended to give any evidence on questions of that kind. That was merely mentioned by me incidentally. Those gentlemen have no idea of my saying one single syllable about Oxford or Cambridge, or anything of the kind.

1404. Are you aware of the reason that Oxford and Cambridge are exempted?—Because they are national colleges for Protestants.

1405. Are you aware that the exemption was in consideration of a constitution regulating those universities by a separate code, especially enacted for those two universities?—It would make no difference, in my opinion, at all, whether there was any such thing or not. I simply say, in answer to the question of the honourable Member, that, in my opinion, Catholics ought to be allowed to give property to their colleges in the same way as Protestants are allowed to give property to theirs. That is all I have said, and I adhere to that opinion.

1406. But you will allow me to ask you further, whether it is your desire that Parliament should frame a code for the regulation of these Roman Catholic colleges, which you consider to be aggrieved?—No; I do not wish Parliament to interfere in the slightest degree with them.

1407. But, at the same time, you desire that the law against superstitious uses, which restrains the gift or devising of property for the purpose of securing by payment prayers for the dead, should be repealed?—I do not see what superstitious uses have to do with colleges; I do not see that there is any relevance at all; colleges and superstitious uses have nothing to do with one another.

1408. Are you aware that the greater part of the property of the colleges at Oxford, Christ Church especially, before the appropriation was altered by Cardinal Wolsey, belonged to religious houses which were supported by property left for securing prayers for the dead, their founders included?—Supposing that to be so, what has it to do, I ask, with religious convents and monasteries of the present day?

1409. I thought you stated that it was a grievance that the law against superstitious uses prevented property being devoted to securing prayers for the dead, which prayers were, formerly in this country, and are still abroad, said by the inmates of monasteries?—But there may be plenty of prayers said by people who are not inmates of monasteries. It does not at all follow that prayers should be ordered to be said by inmates of monasteries. Supposing, for the sake of argument, that a man could leave money for masses, it does not follow that it should be left to inmates of monasteries. There is no connexion between the two, in my humble judgment.

1410. Are you aware of the title of the property which is at present held by Christ Church, that it was originally a property held by monasteries on condition that the inmates of those monasteries said prayers for the dead, the founders included?—I have no doubt that is the case, but it does not at all follow from that that monasteries and colleges of the present day in England are held upon the same condition.

1411. Am I to understand that you declare that the monasteries which exist in England are not tenanted by those who would say prayers for the dead?—Who "would," that is another thing, but they are not held upon any such condition.

1412. But I thought that you refused to state the conditions on which they are held?—I have told you that they are held upon no conditions, consequently they are not held upon that condition.

1413 I thought you objected to the law against superstitious uses, because it operated against the constitution of trusts, including prayers for the dead, and that you said that this law was peculiarly offensive to the Roman Catholic body? —I said that it was offensive to me individually, I did not undertake to answer for other Catholics, nor did I connect superstitious uses, as they are called, in the slightest degree with convents or colleges.

1414. You certainly stated that it was offensive to the Roman Catholic body?—I said that to a great many Roman Catholics I had no doubt it was offensive; but you must particularly understand that I have no authority to speak for Roman Catholics on that subject.

1415. If that law is not offensive to Roman Catholics it is no grievance?—But it is offensive; I have no doubt highly offensive; insulting in the highest degree.

1416. Are you aware that when this country was Roman Catholic, the principle of the laws of Mortmain was enforced in consequence of the accumulation of property in the hands of monasteries or religious bodies collected for the purpose of saying prayers for the dead, including the souls of the founders?—I have no doubt that at that time a great deal of property was collected together for that purpose; but that has nothing to do with the monastic institutions of the present day; here we are in England 1870; it is nothing to me what was the custom or the practice in 1470, I submit to you.

1417. Are you prepared to state that the purposes of the monastic orders, the purposes with which the monastic orders are constituted in the present day, are different from the purposes for which the monastic orders existed prior to the reformation?—I can only say that in the present state of England, in the present state of things, the whole tenor of their lives is very materially different; they have missionary work, and they go and visit; they do not live in common, and the monasteries of the present day in England are as different as possible from the monasteries 400 years ago; you now have monasteries and religious orders having missions and all sorts of things; at that time, they lived as large bodies of men in communities by themselves.

1418. Are you aware that the practice of the Jesuit body in respect of living in community, has always been different from those of the other ancient orders of the Church of Rome?—No; it has been different in different countries, it depends pends upon circumstances; I know what the rule is in England, and I submit that that is all we have to do with.

1419. You are not aware that during the last 40 years there has been an arrangement made by which a great assimilation has taken place in the organisation of the branches of the religious orders throughout the Continent and England, to the organisation of the Jesuits?—I submit that that comes under the question of the character of monastic institutions which does not refer to the present question. The question is, as to the property of these gentlemen, and I will answer anything I can as to that; but as to their character, that is beside the question, I submit to the Chairman.

1420. You stated, with respect to property, that previous to profession, an heir to property must, according to the rules of all these orders, alienate his inheritance by deed?—Yes.

1421. Is that according to the rule of all these orders?—So far as I know; I know of no rule to the contrary.

1422. Are you prepared to assert that that is the rule universally applied?—I am prepared to assert that what I stated in evidence before is the rule which is applied in all the important orders, and, I believe, in all the smaller orders; I know of no exception.

1423. That is part of their organisation?—What I stated is the fact.

1424. You state that that is, within your knowledge, part of their organisation?—I know that from inquiries that I have made, because that relates to property; that is the reason why I made the inquiry.

1425. Then do you believe that this rule is applicable to the orders generally, or is it a special rule with respect to the orders so established in this country?—I believe it is a rule universally adopted by the orders which are established in this country.

1426. And is it also a rule, that if any person, being a member of one of these orders, inherits property after his profession, he shall then alienate it to the next heir?—Certainly.

1427. And by the next heir you mean the next heir according to the law of England?—Certainly; his brother, for instance (I have mentioned the case of a peer), just as though he were dead, in point of fact.

1428. Then practically those orders recognise the civil death of their members?—No, it does not at all follow that practically they do that; on the contrary, I have told you that if they get anything by will they keep it.

1429. But in the matter of inheritance?—In the matter of inheritance it is so.

1430. They recognise the old law that they are civilly dead?—No, they do not recognise the old law; the course is such as it would have been under the old law, but it does not at all follow that they act upon the old law.

1431. They act upon the principle of the old law?—It so happens that the principle of the old law is the same principle as is adopted now, but it does not follow that the rule exists because it was the old rule.

1432. It is adopted in the rules of all these orders?—Yes.

1433. When you speak of legacies, I suppose you mean any property or sum of money devised by will?—Certainly.

1434. In that case the religious person or regular would have the control of that property, according to the rules of his order?—He would take that property; he would not renounce it in favour of anybody, because the testator only wished him to have it.

1435. Then the only exception you make is where inheritance is without a will?—I do not make exceptions; I have simply told you what those two rules are.

1436. I want to know the distinction which this rule makes, whether there is a different rule applicable to property inherited by primogeniture, or the general law of this country, as distinguished from property inherited by will?—Yes, I have told you, I think, in the most distinct terms that it is treated differently.

1437. Then any property devolving on one of these regulars, after profession by will, would be his own?—Certainly.

1438. And then you stated that there is a rule of poverty in these orders, which is not the same rule as the rule of Mendicant Orders enjoining absolute poverty dependent upon alms, but there is a rule restraining the individual members of these orders from the retention of more than a very moderate competence?—Yes, there is a great difference between the Mendicant Orders, and the other orders.

1439. That is to say, there is a rule of poverty universally efficable throughout all these orders, but it is not the rule of the Mendicant Orders?—No; it is not sordid poverty.

1440. But it is in restraint of the retention of above a very moderate income by any of the members of that order?—Any property which a religious man after profession may get to himself, confers upon him individually no personal benefit, because his course of life remains exactly the same. He has no better house, he has no better clothes, no better living, no further amusement, or anything of that kind. It is simply this, that it is his duty not by the law of England, but in his conscience, to apply any money he gets to some good and charitable purpose, and he does so apply it.

1441. And if the community of which he is a member is in need, he would consider the sustentation of that community a good work?—I daresay he would, but he would please himself about that; it is his own affair, he is the legal owner; you do not admit any other law in England but the law of England; and he is the legal owner.

1442. The only rule of the order is, that he shall not keep above a very moderate amount of property for his own use?—That is nothing to the purpose at all, I submit; whether he keeps it or does not, is his own affair; the property descends to him by law under will, and he takes it and does what he likes with it; he would not apply it for his own personal benefit, but to some useful purpose. That would be his better inclination, but it would not constitute a trust.

1443. Are not the members of these orders all bound to promote the continuance and the extension of the order to which they belong?—No; I do not know that they are bound to anything of the kind. It would naturally follow, of course. Any man would like to promote any object which he was ardently attached to; but I never heard any rule on this subject. A man likes to promote the interest of his family, or his country; and, if he belongs to an order, it is not unnatural that he should like to promote the welfare of the order; but I know of no such rule.

1444. You

17 June 1870.

1444. You do not mean, after your previous evidence, that the Committee should understand from you to assert that these regular orders are mere accidental combinations of individuals?—They are, certainly, accidental combinations of individuals. It is a perfect accident whether a man joins an order or not, just as it is an accident whether you join one club or another. Something or other induces him to join the one that he does; but there is no power to make him join.

1445. You have stated certain rules which are applicable to the organisation of all these communities; these communities are bound by certain rules which are applicable to all of them?—Yes.

1446. You cannot term them, therefore, mere accidental combinations?—I know nothing about combinations; I know, as a matter of fact, that one gentleman who has got a considerable property, being a member of these religious orders, gave a great deal of it to some purpose totally foreign to that religious order.

1447. You have stated that 2,032 acres of land belonged to the colleges?—That they were held by the colleges; I did not say that they belonged to them.

1448. To whom do they belong?—They belong to private individuals, as I have before stated.

1449. Being members of those colleges?—Not necessarily.

1450. But the produce of these acres you stated is applicable to the purposes of these colleges?—I said that the legal owners permitted the produce to be applicable; that is what I stated, and that is the fact.

1451. But, practically, the produce is applicable to them?—No; it is allowed to be so applied. It would not be applied if they did not wish it, but it is applied by their permission.

1452. Is Stonyhurst one of those colleges?—I must decline to mention any names of any description. Looking at those clauses in the Catholic Emancipation Act, I must decline to allude by name to any college or colleges.

1453. Then it would be inconsistent with your duty to your clients to tell us whether Oscott is one of those colleges?—Oscott is not, of course, as everybody knows, and therefore I can say that at once. But I decline to enter into that question on the ground of professional confidence. I think I should not be justified under all the circumstances in entering into the question of the names of those colleges. Any information that I can give you at all within the mark, I shall be very happy to give you; but I submit that the names are immaterial.

1454. Will you state the names and the details of the property belonging to these 10 colleges?—No, certainly not.

1455. But you did say that Oscott is not one of them?—You happened to mention Oscott; and that there may be no misapprehension I tell you at once that Oscott is not one of them.

1456. You say that the professors in these colleges are generally of the regular orders?—Yes.

1457. Is not that the case at Oscott?—Oscott is not a conventual or monastic institution in any sense or shape; it has no reference, I submit, to this inquiry.

1458. Then you will say that there is a distinction between Oscott and Stonyhurst?—I do not say whether there is or is not; it is nothing whatever to the purpose, I submit.

1459. You refuse to give any information as to the one, and you consent to give information about the other; where is the difference?—Pardon me, I have given no such consent; on the contrary, I have distinctly told you that I shall decline to give you any information as to any one of these colleges. I have simply told you that there are 2,032 acres of land held with all the 10 colleges belonging to religious communities of men, and I have further stated that there are no more than 10 colleges belonging to religious communities of men, and no more than 2,032 acres of land.

1460. Do you desire to withdraw, as erroneous, the distinction which your previous evidence contains between the status of Oscott and that of Stonyhurst?—I do not withdraw as erroneous anything of the kind. I have not said anything of Stonyhurst. I have simply said that Oscott is not one of the 10 colleges within my evidence.

1461. Do you know the college of Downside?—I submit to the Chairman that it is quite immaterial whether I know it or not.

1462. You decline to state the number of religious persons or regulars in this country?—I do.

1463. But you referred in one of your answers to some work which you called "our 'Directory'"?—The "Catholic Directory" which you yourself produced in the examination of a previous witness.

1464. This is the work (handing the "Catholic Directory" to the Witness)?—That is the work.

1465. Then, in your opinion, are the lists of conventual and monastic institutions given in this "Directory" correct?—In all human probability, they may be correct; it is compiled just like any other "Directory" from information which the publishers endeavour to secure in the best way they can.

1466. Have you any information contradictory of the lists and descriptions here given?—Not any whatever; I should just observe, if you turn to page 288, of that "Directory," you will find it mentioned in the summary of Catholic statistics of Great Britain, at that page, that there are 69 religious communities of men in England; and I have given you information that there are 30 houses and 121 parochial residences; therefore considerably exceeding the 69, so far as that goes.

1467. Then I conceive that the 121 residences and the 30 houses are not all considered by the compilers of this work as monastic or conventual institutions?—I presume so; I have judged so simply by the figures 69 being put; if they had considered that there were more, they would have put more. I have given you a true account of the total number of parochial residences and houses possessed by all the religious men in the country, which exceeds considerably the number in that book.

1468. Then is the Committee to understand that the 69 institutions, named on page 288 of the "Catholic Directory," are included in the 151 houses and parochial residences?—Yes; it would be more correct to have said that there were 30 houses of communities of men and so many parochial residences which are, in the point of fact, mere parish churches.

1469. Then you dispute the accuracy of the number 69 given in this "Roman Catholic Directory," Directory" at page 288, as described in the institutions enumerated as monastic institutions?—Certainly; there are no such things.

1470. There are only 30, you say?—There are only 30, but there are 121 parochial residences belonging to persons who are religious men which they have omitted to mention; therefore I give you that as a little proof that I am not wishing to shirk anything.

1471. Therefore you consider that all the houses of the 69, above the 30 that you have mentioned, are of such small dimensions as not to deserve to be considered monastic institutions?—They are not monastic institutions at all, they are parochial churches.

1472. And yet they are inhabited by regular clergy?—By one or two as missioners, as parish clergy.

1473. Your previous evidence was that they were inhabited by the regular orders?—By one or two; I expressly mentioned that, although members of the regular orders, they were there as parish priests, as working clergy. The mere fact of their belonging to the religious orders makes no difference to their being working clergy; they are working clergy all the same.

1474. But they are regulars?—They belong to regular orders.

1475. And in some cases these houses contain more than two or three such persons, do they not?—I really do not know how many they contain; I simply say, as a general rule, one or two.

1476. That is the general average of the usual number residing?—Yes, in parochial houses, according to the number of the population. There might be one, or two, or three.

1477. Then in certain particulars you dispute the description and enumeration given in this "Catholic Directory"?—No, I do not dispute anything of the kind; I have nothing to do with it at all. You refer to that, and I simply say to you that there are not 69, that is all.

1478. You assert that there are not 69 institutions that deserve to be considered monastic?—Certainly not.

1479. Although they are inhabited by regular priests?—It appears by my evidence that there are only 30 which in any way deserve the name of religious communities, and that the other 121 houses, belonging in fact to different persons who are members of those communities, are simply served by those persons as parish priests, as though they were not regulars.

1480. You would consider it inconsistent with your professional engagements to state where these 150 houses are?—Decidedly.

1481. I think you stated that the total income of personal estate possessed by these regular priests amounts to 10,350 l.?—Per annum in the total.

1482. And as the reason for that amount being so small, you stated that they had been contributing largely to the erection of churches, colleges, and other objects, for the extension of the Roman Catholic faith?—No, I did not state that they had been contributing largely; I said that if there was any little surplus, that little surplus was supplied towards the additions to churches, towards building schools, or some good work.

1483. The words you used, I think were, that that expenditure prevents accumulation?—I said that in consequence of that expenditure, there was no accumulation.

1484. And you stated, in conclusion, that you think it would be objectionable if the law required registration of all this property?—I think that it would be exceedingly objectionable if it was compulsory; I think that it would be a very good thing if it were permissive. It does not at all follow that persons who are members of religious orders to-day should be members of the religious orders to-morrow; they might choose to leave the religious orders, and the property might go in some other way; you cannot make anything compulsory in that way.

1485. Are you aware that in the case of the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge registration is exacted?—That may be so.

1486. That is a condition which you do not wish to be imposed upon the establishments which you represent?—I think that in some cases it might be considered objectionable; I merely state my individual opinion, that is all. The gentlemen interested might take quite a different view. But I was not prepared to enter into points of this kind, but merely to tell you the extent of their property, and how it was held, received, and possessed. I simply give you my own individual opinion.

1487. Do I rightly understand that the tendency of your evidence is, that you object to the restraints imposed by law upon the establishment of the regular orders in this country?—I do object to them, as being most offensive and injurious to Catholic interests.

1488. You object generally to the restraints of the law of mortmain?—No, not generally. I say that Catholics, I think, should be enabled to do for their colleges and institutions what Protestants can do for theirs. I do not object to a proper law of mortmain; on the contrary, I think that a proper law of mortmain is a good thing. But I simply say that what a Protestant can do, that a Catholic ought to be able to do, in my judgment, or a Dissenter.

1489. And the case which you instanced of advantages which the Protestants possess, and the Catholics do not, were the two universities?—I simply alluded to those as an instance.

1490. Would you object to equivalent restraints and equivalent legislation being applied to these Roman Catholic institutions, to those which are applied to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge?—I do not think that the Catholics of England should be more favoured than Protestants. I am not speaking for Catholics, but for myself. I think that there ought to be the most perfect equality of justice, that one should not be favoured more than another in questions of property. I do not think that Catholics should be favoured more that Protestants, or Protestants favoured more than Catholics.

1491. I am afraid your evidence would amount to this, that you object to restraints altogether?—I do certainly to any further restraints than are imposed upon Protestants. They cannot leave, except to certain colleges, by will.

1492. You object to the conditions under which those colleges exist being applied to Roman Catholic colleges?—I say that I think registration might be objected to in some cases, in all probability; it might not always.

1493. And therefore you would not object to visitation?—Of course, I should object to visitation.

1494. You are aware that the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge have visitors recognised by law?—

law?—I should not object to the same kind of visitation that is carried on towards Protestant colleges, in the same way exactly, as far as that goes, if you mean that; but I object to our being visited and others not; I object to our being placed in a different position from other places. Why should we? We are Englishmen just as much as other people.

1495. Are you prepared to suggest a form of visitation which you would approve of?—No; I did not come prepared to suggest anything of the sort.

1496. But generally you object to the law as it exists?—I object to the law as it exists.

1497. Mr. Pease.] You have stated that any surplus from the annual income is almost always invested in articles, or in purposes for the benefit of the institution?—I said that in cases where there happens to be any little surplus it is expended in additions to churches probably, or in poor schools, or in some other good work.

1498. There is nothing in the legal disabilities to which you have alluded which prevents the accumulation of property, is there?—No, not that I am aware of; but there is no desire to accumulate.

1499. Accumulation does take place not so much from income, but from additional benefactors?—No accumulation takes place at all; I should not call that an accumulation; it is simply this, if there is a little surplus, a few hundred pounds, you may put a new window into a church, or put an additional wing to a school, or something of that kind.

1500. I do not wish to ask any question in violation of the rule which you have laid down for yourself, but the 10,350 l. a year, and the beneficial occupation of about 2,500 acres of land, cannot maintain the colleges which you have named?—No, but the pensions must be taken into account.

1501. May I assume that there are pensions, education fees, and gifts, which make up the required amount of their income?—There are pensions, as I mentioned, of 40 l., 50 l., 60 l., and 100 l. a year from the scholars; and it is by reason of the services of the gentlemen who conduct these establishments, being in fact gratuitous, that so much can be done with so small an amount of money.

1502. You stated that Catholics ought to be able to do for their institutions what Protestants and Dissenters (I do not know why you draw that distinction between Protestants and Dissenters) can do for theirs; that is your decided opinion?—Yes.

1503. Without reference to the character of the religious purposes, or rites, or uses involved?—Yes.

1504. That is, you think, that it is hard that an endowment, or a benefaction, or a bequest, should become invalid merely because it is left for the purposes of prayers for the dead, for instance?—Yes, certainly I do.

1505. This is on the ground of those views of religious equality which are prevalent in this country?—Certainly.

1506. Then you say that all religious bodies should be treated alike?—I say so.

1507. Would not that involve you in the toleration of Mormonism and its rites, or even of Heathenism and its rites?—I should not call Mormonism religion, but socialism.

1508. Who is to be the judge where religion ends, and socialism begins?—I would extend toleration to all those who profess the Christian religion.

1509. Then you have to come back to the State, to say where the line is to be drawn?—Parliament must decide what is Christian and what is unchristian in the eye of the law; there is no power in England but Parliament, I suppose, to decide it.

1510. There is a point where the State must intervene in that respect?—Yes.

1511. There is a point where it must define the difference between religious liberty and licentiousness.

1512. Mr. G. Gregory.] With regard to what you have said about your colleges, the Presbyterians, I believe, have their colleges, the Wesleyans have their colleges, and other denominations have endowed colleges?—Yes.

1513. Why should not you?—I do not see why we should not. We can have them now, provided that they were not connected with monastic institutions. Those penal sections of the Catholic Act Emancipation Act prevent any legal trust being declared of any institution which is managed by and belongs to the members of a religious order.

1514. Then your grievance, as I understand, is not with respect to the institution itself, but the machinery by which it is conducted?—Certainly; colleges which are not conducted by religious men are not illegal.

1515. Colleges you can have, but you cannot have them under the jurisdiction of religious orders?—No; and then it comes again to this, that owing to the small number of Roman Catholics willing to teach, the effect of not having members of the religious orders for that work would be that we could not have colleges, because the persons could not be found. They are absolutely necessary for the Catholic body in this country.

1516. On the question of the legality of colleges, you admit that you can have them on the same footing as other denominations?—Yes.

1517. But you have a difficulty, because you wish them to be conducted by religious orders?—Because the great majority of them must necessarily be conducted by the religious orders; the men are not to be found without.

1518. And that difficulty you wish to have removed?—Certainly.

1519. And you put that on the footing that the colleges at the universities are not subject to the same difficulty?—No, that was merely a passing observation with reference to what I think Catholics ought to be able to do.

1520. But I understand that your ground for asking for the removal of this disability is, that there are other colleges established in this country which are not so restricted?—I should consider any restriction altogether improper, and exceedingly hard; but I do not put it on the ground of other people having this, or not having that. I simply say that there is a law which restrains any gift to any institution belonging to religious men.

1521. Do you give up, then, any analogy between these colleges and those of Oxford and Cambridge?—No, I simply said this, and I wish the Committee to understand it, that our great colleges, so far as we are concerned, are as dear to us, and as important to us, as your great colleges are to you.

522. But do you wish them to be put on the e footing as our colleges?—I am not suffi-tly acquainted with the footing on which r colleges are to be able to answer your stion. I happen to have been educated at of our own colleges.

523. But as you have been giving evidence ut ours, and comparing your own with them, resume you made yourself first acquainted h the constitution of ours?—Pardon me; ting it broadly, I simply said this, that the rtmain Act excepts certain colleges belonging Protestants, and that it is a great advantage Protestants to be able to leave property to se colleges for the purposes of education. ay that we Catholics have not the same antages with reference to colleges which to us nd in exactly the same position and light as se colleges do to you.

1524. Now I ask you whether you desire to put on the same footing as those colleges are, merely with respect to the Mortmain Act; you willing to be put in other respects on the ne footing?—You manage your colleges as you e, and we wish to manage ours as we like.

1525. We do not manage ours, but the law es; are you willling to come under the same v?—I am not able to pledge others.

1526. If you demand the same rights, are you lling to take the same liabilities?—I do not mand the same rights; I simply said that I ought it hard that we should not be free to ave property to such institutions.

1527. You see your observation comes to this, d you have repeated it now, that certain col-ges in these two Universities are exempted om the Statute of Mortmain; you say it is hard at your colleges should not be exempted in the me manner?—I think it is.

1528. And I ask whether, giving you the same emptions, you are willing to take the same bilities as those colleges to which you refer?—really do not know what those liabilities are; I resay that there would be no objection; but nether there would or not, would depend on e gentlemen who conduct those colleges.

1529. Surely you have made yourself to some tent acquainted with the state of the law as aring upon those colleges?—No; I really do t know what the rules and regulations of those lleges are.

1530. You are aware that the Crown appoints itors to those colleges?—I heard it mentioned st now; I daresay that I may have heard it 20 nes before, but my attention was never directed it at all.

1531. You have been asked as to the question a constructive trust in property which is held these religious bodies; the property is vested joint tenancy, and of course it survives to the t of those joint tenants?—Yes; unless some-ng else intervenes in the meantime.

1532. I am taking simply joint tenants with-t any fresh nominations?—Certainly, in that se it does.

1533. The survivor would take it, according to u, both legally and equitably entirely?—Yes.

1534. Supposing that he left an infant heir? It would go to the heir if he did not leave a ll.

1535. Absolutely?—Yes.

1536. And you would have no claim upon it? None in law.

1537. Or in equity?—Not in equity, as ad-nistered by the Court of Chancery. You must remember that I premised in the first instance that the property, generally speaking, is property given by members themselves, that is to say, belonging to them; there has been no claim of trust from generation to generation, but the property almost entirely is the property belonging to persons now living; they have never created any trust at all; they have simply chosen to give it during a certain number of years, just as if you chose to give 500*l.* a year to Charing Cross Hospital for 20 years, it does not follow that you would give it after that.

1538. But we have a question of 2,500 acres of land vested in these trustees?—Not trustees.

1539. Vested in joint tenants?—Yes.

1540. I am supposing the survivor of these joint tenants to die without a will, leaving an infant heir; to whom would the property go?—To the infant heir absolutely.

1541. None of the members of these societies would have any claim on it?—No.

1542. You would give it up?—I simply say that I believe that would be law.

1543. You have given us an income of 10,350*l.* a year, received by these religious persons?—Yes, received as individuals by persons who happen also to be religious men.

1544. And from your description of the application of that, I gather that it is all charity?—No, not charity at all; simply, as I said before, that it is their own property which they choose to distribute in a certain manner during their own will and pleasure.

1545. I think you told us that it was devoted to the maintenance of old men who have grown old in their service?—That is to say, their own members; they choose so to devote it.

1546. That is a charitable purpose?—It is a gift, it is not a trust.

1547. I am not speaking of the trust; I am speaking of the purpose?—It is a kind thing to do.

1548. Is it not charity in the legal sense of the word?—No, certainly not; not a charitable trust, because there is no trust.

1549. I am not speaking of a trust at all. Is it not a charitable application of the property?—It is just like this case: supposing, for instance, this 10,350*l.* a year belonged to one particular person as his own property, and he chose to devote a part of it to this and that charity, and the rest to foxhounds, he is under no obligation to continue that charitable application.

1550. I am only asking you whether these purposes are not what are commonly known in law as charitable purposes?—Not in law.

1551. Not the maintenance of old men, for instance?—That is not considered a charitable trust in any way.

1552. Let us drop "trust;" is it not a charitable purpose in law if a man gives money to the maintenance of old men?—That puts the case in a very different light from what it really is; it is a charity in the same sense as any money that you give in charity; no more than that; there is no obligation to continue it; it is a mere application for a kind or charitable use for the time being; a very praiseworthy application.

1553. Here is an annual income of 10,350*l.* applied to a charitable use?—Not all necessarily applied to a charitable use.

1554. But the greater part of it; it is derived from various sources, and vested in several individuals. Now, supposing that it belonged to any other denomination, would not it come under the trustees of charities?—No, because these gentlemen are not bound as to manner, time, place, or anything else. It is quite different from a charity; it is no charity at all, and has nothing to do with charity. Simply because they choose to apply their money for a certain purpose during their own will or pleasure, that does not constitute a charity.

1555. But these purposes are not "their own purposes"?—Yes, they are their own purposes; these purposes are the hobby of their lives.

1556. Do not they constitute themselves charitable trustees?—They are not trustees; they do not hold it for the purpose of administering in charity; they might spend a great deal more upon themselves if they liked, very properly for the sake of their own health and recreation, and it is a great pity that they do not.

1557. The honourable Member for North Warwickshire has asked you about some brief issued in 1850; does that brief affect the question of the devaluation of property in any way?—Not in the slightest degree.

1558. It does not refer to it?—Not in the least.

1559–60. Either legally or as a matter of conscience?—I cannot answer that question; but it does not in my own conscience in any shape or way; as far as I know, it has nothing whatever to do with it. I do not believe that any brief from the Pope has anything whatever to do with the property of the religious communities.

1561. Mr. Talbot.] You said that these persons were not trustees, did you not?—Certainly.

1562. The reason why there are no such trusts is because the trusts would not be illegal, as I understand you?—I do not say that that is the reason; I say that if the trusts were legal it is quite possible that people would give property for those purposes.

1563. But I thought you complained that people were not able to give it for those purposes?—So I did; non constat, that they would, even if the trusts were legal.

1564. If they had the power of making these trusts, you would not object to their being under the same obligation as other trustees, I suppose?—I think that if there were trusts they should be under the same obligation as other trustees.

1565. Under public jurisdiction, to see that the trusts were fulfilled?—Yes.

1566. Mr. Pemberton.] I understood you to say, in answer to the honourable Member for Sussex, that you thought a trust for the benefit of old persons was not a charitable use?—No; a trust would be, but the mere fact of your choosing to give of your own accord, from your own money, 500 l. to old people, does not make a charitable trust; it is a charitable act to do, but it does not entitle that person, for instance, to the continuance of it. It is just simply this, that a person having a particular sum of money at his command, chooses to devote a part of that money to a particular purpose, which happens to be charitable; he is not obliged to do it again the next day or the next year.

1567. I understood you to say that a gift in support of old persons was not what the law calls a charitable use?—It is a charitable act, of course, to give money for the support of old persons; of course, I do not deny that.

1568. I am asking you, as a lawyer, whether a gift, to go towards the support of old persons, is not what the law calls a charitable use?—Of course it is, if you leave a sum of money by a will, or if you devise the interest of it, to be s employed; but if you go bodily, and give 100 for an object, you give it, and there is an end the thing.

1569. Is not that a charitable use, if you giv it for the benefit of old persons, for instance?— Yes, but in no way binding; it is simply a chari table act, done with the interest of certai money.

1570. But do I rightly understand you to sa that that is not a charitable use?—You are no bound to continue it.

1571. Of course, if I give one 100 l. I am no bound to give another?—Supposing, for instanc that you had the interest of 10,000 l., and yo receive 300 l. from the dividends in the consols and you give 100 l. in a particular year to an hospital, that is a charitable act; you cannot however, say because a man does that, tha therefore there is a trust in any shape or way.

1572. A trust to do more, of course not; bu there is a trust to do that?—The thing is don and finished with.

1574. I will take a gift to four persons of particular parish or locality; it is what the law calls a charitable use, and a trust which a cour of equity will support?—If you give capital quite agree with you; but if you give a sum o money to dispense there is an end of it, just as you meet a poor man in the street, and give hi a shilling.

1576. Mine is the mere general question?— That is a different point.

1577. I think that you have, perhaps, misun derstood my questions from confusing them wit the subject-matter of the previous questions?— Very likely.

1578. In reference to this property held b the 10 colleges, the case was put to you that i had been held by two or three persons, tenant in common for some time as joint tenants, an ultimately the surviving joint tenant dies with out a will, leaving an infant heir; I think yo said it was your opinion that the property woul be the property of the infant heir?—I think generally, that it would in the circumstances i which these different properties are placed.

1579. Do you think if the estate of that hei was administered in the Court of Chancery, an it was proved to the Court of Chancery that th property had never been applied by the father o the infant for his own purposes, but that it ha for many years been applied to this particula purpose, the Court of Chancery would hold it t be the property of the infant heir?—How coul it be applied to the father if the father neve had it?

1580. If it were property held by many per sons, as joint tenants, and ultimately by the deatl of two or more, it survives to one only, and tha one dies, leaving an infant heir, what then?— You know it makes all the difference in this case that there would be no son, because the ma being a priest, a religious man, he could have n son.

1581. Mr. Jessel.] Why not have had a so previously viously to profession?—He might have had viously.

582. Mr. Pemberton.] The last holder of this perty, we will say, dies, leaving an infant heir; Court of Chancery administers this property, inquires what property the deceased was en- ed to; do you mean to say that when the irt of Chancery found that this property had er been received by the deceased man, for his benefit, they would hold that it belonged to heir?—But you find, in many cases, that these sons have received the rent and the income, after they have received it, they have done tain things with it.

583. Mr. Jessel.] Mr. Pemberton puts the e of the trustees of the college where the pro- ty has always been used for the college itself? hat is a different thing.

584. Mr. Pemberton.] I refer to cases where as never been used by these persons, except joint tenants?—I cannot say what the law uld do in those cases; each case must depend itself; it would depend on the length of time, a thousand different things.

585. Take the case of a man who dies never ing spent the money for his own purposes, and ves an infant heir, who legally, but not equit- y, would be entitled to the property; do you nk that the Court of Chancery would find that t property was the property of the intestate son?—It would depend on length of time, and ariety of circumstances.

586. Mr. Matthews.] It would depend on ether the Court of Chancery was, in fact, sfied that a trust did exist?—Yes.

587. But, as I understand, the utmost pains taken to prevent any trust arising, precisely ause the trust would be illegal and would in- idate the deed?—Yes.

588. The Court of Chancery would, of course, any other court, give the property to the son to whom it belonged, unless he were stee for somebody else?—Of course, if the irt found that he was trustee for somebody he would not have it. The question is, ether there is sufficient evidence to establish rust; it depends on the particular circum- nces of each case.

589. Mr. Jessel.] The question of a trust is ependent of the legality of the trust?—Cer- nly.

590. Mr. Matthews.] But as a fact, the trust uld have to be established?—Yes; and that uld be the difficulty.

591. Do you know anything about this brief, which an honourable Member has referred?—, to tell you the honest truth, nothing at all.

592. Do you know whether it was a brief that s issued at the time that the ecclesiastical rarchy was being established in this country? No, I do not know that.

593. You are not aware that it has anything do with monastic institutions, at all events?—think, whatever the brief may be, it cannot ect the law of property in England.

594. Mr. O'Reilly.] You have been asked ether unlimited freedom of religious endow- nt, such as you suggest, would not lead to the cognition of Mormonism or Heathenism. Let call your attention to a return headed "Dis- nters' Places of Worship in England and Wales," places of meeting for religious worship in gland and Wales certified to the Registrar neral under the Act 15 & 16 Vict. c. 36, ted 18th May 1870, by which it appears that 0.92. there are 81 places for the Latter Day Saints or Mormons, so registered as Dissenters' places of worship in England and Wales. Do not you think that that amounts to something like a recognition of Mormonism in England and Wales?—I think it must if those places are authorised to be registered.

1595. Mr. Sherlock.] Assuming the legality of these monastic institutions, the common form in which the property which they derive benefit from is held, is by vesting this property as joint tenants, without any declaration of trust whatsoever. Do you now, as a lawyer, consider that it is as advisable a mode of holding property, to have an absence of any declaration, and that it is as beneficial to the parties who may consider themselves interested in the property, as if there were a declaration of trust in their favour?—No; I think that it would be much better as a general rule, except in extraordinary cases, that there should be a regular declaration of trust; but I observed to another honourable Member that it might happen that a declaration of trust would be very inconvenient; when, in point of fact, the object was not at all definite, but it was uncertain how it was wished to apply the money. In other cases where the object was definite and certain, I think it would be much better to have the property legally secured.

1596. In such a case, the trustees could not themselves personally, nor could their heirs, ever claim any beneficial interest in the property?—No.

1597. And in the absence of proof in the first-mentioned case that there was a trust, the heir-at-law might claim the property, and yet there might be no evidence to contradict that claim?—Certainly.

1598. In such a case there would be an injustice to the parties entitled to that property, would there not?—There would.

1599. You were asked by the honourable Member for North Warwickshire whether these monastic institutions did not recognise the principle of civil death, by the fact that a party entitled to an estate previous to his taking the vows or becoming a member of the community, assigns over the property to the next heir. I understood you to say that he reserved generally some property for himself?—A little annuity.

1600. But I presume that the reservation of any property would be rather inconsistent with the fact either of civil death or natural death?—I simply say that that is the rule and the custom, that a religious man, if he inherits any property, gives it up to the next heir, reserving something for himself if necessary; he might or might not reserve that.

1601. So that the actual doctrine principle of civil death, which would exclude him from reserving anything whatsoever, cannot apply at all to the case as it is in fact?—No.

1602. The legal right to assert any claim to property still continues?—Yes; according to the law of England.

1603. And that is inconsistent with civil death?—Yes; quite so.

1604. I also understood you to say that you did not know yourself anything of the regulations or laws under which the great Universities of Oxford and Cambridge now hold their property?—I really have not given my attention to that.

1605. And, therefore, you cannot say whether it is advisable to adopt those regulations with reference to Roman Catholic colleges?—No, I cannot.

1606. Chairman.] Did I rightly understand you to say that you had had some distinct communication with these monastic institutions, or those who represent them, before you appeared here?—Yes; I have advised during many years several religious men on their affairs.

1607. But have you had any special communication with them with a view to the evidence which you were to give before this Committee?—Certainly; otherwise I should not have given it at all; I have generally had direct communications with their solicitors, and where I thought that not sufficient I have seen several of the superiors of the orders myself, in order to satisfy my mind that what I was going to say was a correct and proper statement of the case.

1608. But with respect to the amount of property which they hold, you only know what has been told you?—How can I rely upon anything else?

1609. It is a personal communication that has been made to you with a view to a statement to be made before this Committee?—A confidential communication made to me through their solicitors generally, and in one or two cases I have seen the parties themselves; and all I can say is this, that I firmly believe that it is thoroughly truthful and accurate in all respects whatsoever, and that I am not aware of the least inaccuracy of any description.

1611. Do not we rightly collect from you that there is no limit to the amount which they might hold both of real and personal estate, supposing that they were fortunate enough to receive it?—It is impossible to say what a man who will join a religious order may give to it; a man might happen to join who was very rich.

1612. But there is no limit that the law imposes, as far as I understand you, no restriction even of those restrictions which you complain of, that prevents their accumulating property?—The law does not allow these religious men, as such, to hold anything at all.

1614. And all that you know of what they possess is, what they actually show you an account of?—Yes, but I have not the slightest doubt in the world of the accuracy of that statement.

1615. But you did not receive any account from them, did you, of what is given or brought by persons when they first join the community, and which goes to the common fund, I suppose?—But this income of which I have been speaking arises from all those monies which are so brought; it is the result of them.

1616. Then do I rightly understand that that amount which you have stated is the result of all the property that is held by the 151 institutions?—Yes; you must remember this, that as a general rule eldest sons do not join these religious bodies, only younger sons. Of course their property is very much smaller than that of eldest sons; if they took the whole of their portion it would be very small, but as a general rule they do not take above half their portion with them; consequently there are no means to create any fund; they have nothing scarcely; very have anything, and those that have someth have not much.

1617. Did you see the different account these different institutions?—I had written st ments from their solicitors, or from the pa themselves in each case.

1618. I think, with respect to what would perly be called monastic institutions, you s that there are only 30 of such in this count —There are only 30 houses held as such; t are nothing like so many orders, of course, there are only 30 houses strictly held as con tual or monastic institutions, that is to say, t have not missions attached to them.

1619. But with respect to the personal real estate, it belongs to the 30 houses, doe not?—And to the 121 houses also.

1620. The 121 seem only to be parochial r dences, as far as I understand you?—Yes.

1621. Did you go into the income which th persons receive?—No, not what they rec from voluntary contribution, of course; I speaking of income from property, but I very well acquainted with the state of the aff of those gentlemen generally, and I can s say that, as a general rule, I am quite sure I correct in saying that they do not get m than a curate gets in the Established Church.

1622. With respect to the 121 parochial r dences where you say one man belonging religious order would live alone, or at most or three persons in the same house, what is th income derived from?—Simply from what th get in the church from bench rents and con butions in the country, and in other ways, other churches.

1623. But besides that income which you h mentioned of 10,000 l., there is the land attac to the colleges (these 2,500 acres) which yi so much rent, I suppose?—They hold the l themselves generally; some of them may rec a little from it, but that is not taken into acco not being an item of any importance.

1624. That land goes to the support of th 30 houses?—No doubt they would have the of any little bit of ground, orchard, or anyth of the sort that belongs to the house.

1625. The persons living in these parish r dences do not derive anything from this comr fund, do they?—No, excepting where the c tributions of the congregation are so small t they require some assistance to live.

1626. Then some assistance is afforded th out of this common fund?—Yes, to those pa priests who have not sufficient money from th congregation to enable them to live.

1627. But are there some that serve churches and live in these institutions?—Y they are just like secular persons, except t they have some rules or regulations by wh they are bound; they are parish priests to intents and purposes.

1628. But we understand you clearly t there are about 30 places in this country t are properly called monasteries?—Not mo teries in the sense in which that word would understood; they are rather houses in which ligious men live, because a monastery mean place where men are shut in entirely.

1629. Most people, looking at the reference this Committee, would suppose that a mona institution meant a monastery according to the o nary acceptation of the term. I want to know w ther there are such places or not in this count —Th

-There may be one or two such places in Eng-nd, but I am not aware of above one or two, here, for instance, they cultivate ground, and hat sort of thing; those are very peculiar orders; ut as a general rule they are engaged in teaching.

1630. I am not asking you now how they employ heir time, but I am asking with reference to what called a monastery or monastic institution, whether there are buildings or places in this ountry where a number of men are collected to-ether employing their time variously, but realiz-ng the notion which people have of monasteries? -That is quite a delusion.

1631. Do you say that there are no such laces?—There may be one or two places of that escription, as I said before; for instance, the Trappists; everybody knows of them, and it is no ecret.

1632. The general notion is, and I think it has een stated in the House of Commons, that these nstitutions are numerous and are increasing, whereas, according to your account, they are few nd much fewer now than they used to be in ormer times?—Yes.

1633. I want to know where do these joint enants live, or who are these joint tenants that re selected to hold property, and whose failure n number, whenever it occurs, is always sup-lied?—In all probability some members of the rder would be selected.

1634. But where do the congregations dwell hat are maintained by these joint tenancies? -There is no congregation that benefits except, s I said before, when the new person applies the roperty in just the same way as the old person id.

1635. But I understand that what we call nonastic institutions are now represented in certain amount of parish residences, occupied by ne or two or three people; but at the same time here is property enjoyed by people belonging o religious orders, and this property is made afe by being conveyed to them as joint tenants. want to know where are these joint tenants ound?—They are members of the orders, of ourse.

1636. Do you mean that there are distinct rders whose members communicate, but do not well together?—These joint tenants are some f the gentlemen who form the community; not eople abroad, or anything of that kind.

1637. I want to know whether they do live in ommunity?—Some of them may live in a mis-ion; that is just as it happens.

1638. And they know each other, I suppose? -They will know each other as friends.

1639. Supposing that the property conveyed o three or four joint tenants was very valuable, ve learn that the trusts by which the conveyance s made are not specified?—No.

1640. But there are a certain number of people who look after the employment or administration f the proceeds of this estate, and who may bene-it by it, that is the community; they do not live ogether, but they have an understanding with ach other?—Yes.

1641. There are different orders of this kind? -Yes, some different orders.

1642. Is there any designation by which they an be distinguished?—The only thing you can ay is this: everyone knows that you see con-tantly S. J., and everyone knows what that neans; and that O. S. B. means the order of St. Benedict; and O. S. D., or the order of St. Dominic. Those letters are known to Roman Catholics just as R. N. is known to mean Royal Navy, or R. A. Royal Academy.

1643. That is to say, there are different orders, and these letters distinguish the persons belonging to each?—Nothing more than that.

1644. Do they sign their names with these initials?—Sometimes they might, and sometimes not.

1645. And are there times when all those belonging to one order assemble together?—I really am not able to tell you about that.

1646. Have these persons belonging to the same order, but living apart, any common purpose?—The only purposes would be those either of education or parish work. It is simply this: that the person who is for the time being the superior of the particular order imagines that a particular person's time and abilities may be best employed in teaching, for instance, the higher studies in such-and-such a place, or in teaching young ecclesiastics in another place, or that such-and-such a person will be better adapted for parish work; and the thing is managed just in the same way as the army is managed, when it is considered that such-and-such a regiment should go to one place, and such-and-such a regiment to another.

1647. Therefore, there is a superior?—There must always in every order be a head for the time being.

1648. There is a record kept by him of all those who belong to the order, I presume?—I do not know that.

1649. There is notice taken of what each member of the order is doing?—The superior knows that, but whether he keeps any written record I cannot tell you.

1650. Are these persons belonging to the religious orders in any relation to the bishop of the diocese?—No, I think not; I think that they act independently of the bishop; but, of course, subject to the bishop's wishes; for instance, supposing that the bishop considered that a particular person was objectionable for a particular parish, I have no doubt that he would be immediately removed to a different place.

1651. But if any difference arose with respect to the application of the property or the administration of it, would the bishop be referred to? —The bishop would have nothing to do with it.

1652. Would it be referred to Rome?—No.

1653. You say that it would not be referred to the bishop or to Rome, and it seems that our courts have nothing to do with it; how is such a case decided, then?—It is settled between themselves; there are no disputes; we never hear of any.

1654. Do they never differ?—Not in that shape.

1655. Supposing that the descendent of some benefactor considered that the trusts were not administered properly, or according to the wish of the donor, and he was to call for an account or to interfere, who would decide that matter, or to whom would it be referred?—But I do not think that there is such a case as a sum of money given by a benefactor and then held under a trust.

1656. Do I rightly understand that when a benefactor has made an assignment (absolutely, as you say) of the property to certain persons, no one has the power of interfering with them as to the way in which it is administered?—When we talk of a benefactor, one would imagine that it is some person out of the order, but the fact simply is, that these gentlemen holding themselves the property in their own right choose to permit that it shall be applied in a particular manner for their own purpose. It is not like other people out of the order giving money under a trust, that is a different case; it is more like a club agreeing together that their affairs shall be managed in such-and-such a way. It is very difficult for persons who are not Catholics to imagine the way in which these things are conducted; people run away with notions of immense wealth, which are quite absurd.

1657. But there have been cases in modern days which have been noticed in public, in which very wealthy Catholic proprietors, sometimes peers have died, and left large bequests, even in the way which you have pointed to, and left them absolutely to some friends, trusting to their not taking any benefit themselves from the property, but applying it to some religious purpose, contrary to law; now supposing that anybody knew what the intention was, for which that property was given, he could still get no redress, as I understand you, for any improper application of that property?—As regards the religious orders, I think it is exceedingly unusual for anything to be left in that way; of course, we know that there is a good deal of other property belonging to secular bodies, but the religious bodies are not fixed in one place.

1658. I am referring to evidence given here to the effect that property is really given to be held as the property of these orders, but that the state of our law has driven them to resort to these means of joint tenancies; and therefore as I presume that as many pious bequests are made in the Catholic community as in others, the case must occur of questions arising as to whether these legatees or assignees have applied the property as intended; all I collect from you is, that as the property is given to them absolutely, they must do as they think right with it?—All I can say is, that they do as they think right with it; and I do not know of such cases as you point to arising.

1659. But I understand you to say that you would rather that these trusts should be noticed by our own courts so that their administration should not be discretionary among certain persons; that, in fact, any legal impediment which now exists should be removed, and that they should come within the purview of our law?—I would say that for certain persons who now club together, and have a certain fund, and wish that it should be devoted to a certain definite purpose, and wish to register it in that way, it is a proper thing that they should be allowed to do so.

1660. But you are not satisfied with the manner in which property is left or given to these institutions at present, owing to the state of our law?—Many people would consider it much better that there should be registration in some of these cases.

1661. And do you believe that there would be registration, supposing that we removed those obstacles to the open declaration of trust which exist at present?—I have no doubt that there would be a great many declarations of trust. I cannot, of course, bind other persons, but speaking for myself, I think that a great many persons would register. There would be some that would feel their objects to be very uncertain; and from causes of that kind they might hesitate to register, but perhaps after a little time, they might do so. I cannot say as to that, however, because it is a serious thing to bind yourself to the application of money to a definite purpose.

1662. At present you consider, as I understand you, that there is some risk attending a declaration of trust, in consequence of the law affecting Catholic bequests?—There is this risk, that a person might die without any will, and some damage might possibly arise from it.

1663. Mr. Newdegate.] In objecting to the restraints upon religious orders, and especially the Jesuits, you said that when they had been expelled from various countries or restrained, that had been done by revolution?—It had either been preceded immediately or succeeded very soon by revolution.

1664. That it was an act of revolution, you said?—Of course I do not come here professing to be able to give you any information about foreign countries, with which probably you are much better acquainted than I am; but my general impression as to those secret societies is that they are enemies of all religions, just as much of yours as of ours; they are in fact infidels, and therefore they hate all religions, and their object is simply to destroy everything that is religious, and they combine together with a view to prevent religion flourishing in any country. And the next thing is to do away with the king, and then with your estates.

1665. You were speaking of the laws of this country in restraint of these regular orders, and you were asked by the Chairman if you had not heard of still stronger measures being adopted by foreign countries, and you said that that was always by revolutions; I wish to ask you whether you are aware that in the year 1773, Pope Clement the 14th suppressed the whole order of Jesuits?—I am.

1666. That was not the act of revolution?—They were not turned out of the country, their order was suppressed simply, and it was re-established afterwards, as if you go a little further on in history, you will find.

1667. Are you aware that, during the reign of the Emperor Alexander, the Jesuits were expelled from Russia by a ukase, dated the 13th of March 1820, when there was no revolution?—I am not at all surprised at anything that comes from the Emperor of Russia. But I say it is nothing to us what foreign countries do. If foreign countries act illiberally and do wrong, that is no reason why we in England should do it. The question is, what is right for us Englishmen: you Protestants have liberty; we are Englishmen as well as you, and we think that we ought to have a fair share of your rights and liberties. What they have done in other countries I pay no regard to; they do a great many bad things in other countries and some good ones; but the question is, what we in this country ought to do.

1668. I wished you to explain what you meant by restraint on these orders being the act of revolution?—I was thinking of such countries as Spain and Portugal. Kings have gone away, the religious orders have been banished, and church property has been stolen. But, however, as I said before, we expect something better from England than we do from countries abroad.

1669. As you refer to Spain and Portugal, are you aware that Spain and Portugal were enumerated in the brief of 1773, which suppressed the order of Jesuits?—I am not aware of that.

THE RIGHT HON. CHARLES PELHAM VILLIERS, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JAMES CUDDON, re-called; and further Examined.

Mr. J. Cuddon. 21 June 1870.

1670. Chairman.] I BELIEVE there is some matter on which you gave evidence last time on which you wished to offer some explanation to the Committee?—Yes. You expressed a wish that some information should be given to you as to the number of priests in the religious bodies. There is every desire to respond to the great courtesy of the Chairman, by giving him every information which he thinks would be at all serviceable in this inquiry. The Chairman particularly mentioned his desire to be informed as regards the number of the gentlemen who form these religious orders, but I was not prepared to give that information on the last occasion, first of all, because I did not know it exactly, and, secondly, because I had no authority to give it; but since Friday I have obtained the permission of my friends to satisfy the Chairman and the Committee on that point, and I will state the result. I cannot tell you, of course, to just one or two, beca use people are dying, and coming and going away; but a few days ago the exact number of priests of religious orders in Great Britain was 476; these are the gentlemen engaged in the 10 colleges to which I have referred as preceptors, and masters, and prefects, and in various occupations as rectors, and who are also engaged in the 121 parishes which I have referred to. I may also mention that the total number of young men who are preparing for orders in these religious bodies is 300, as nearly as possible.

1671. Mr. Newdegate.] Are these novices?—Not altogether novices, some are students; though the noviceship takes a long time; the whole number of those who are preparing for the priesthood is 300.

1672. Chairman.] That is not including the number of about 1,100 that you stated on the last occasion?—No; those are the sons of gentlemen in the higher classes and higher middle classes; these 300 are gentlemen, too, but they are young gentlemen, preparing for the Church, in point of fact.

1673. Mr. Jessel.] Is that the number studying for the regular priesthood?—For the regular priesthood; I am only giving evidence now as regards the religious orders, not as regards anything else. The total number of men called lay brothers, who in point of fact act as gentlemen's servants (the services that one of these lay brothers performs are those of a gentleman's servant), including such of them as are capable of teaching, and do teach in poor schools (for some of them are exceedingly well informed), is 200.

1674. They are, to a great extent, servants?—They are; they perform to a great extent the duties of servants, although we know that princes have entered as lay brothers, yet they have performed those duties. Then my attention was drawn I may say to this point; I stated that there were so many acres held with the colleges; but it happened that a great number of those acres are in one county, in which there is a customary measure, and the people there are in the habit of giving customary measure; and in order that the Committee may have really accurate information, and that I should be myself at no future period liable to be misunderstood in any way as giving any information that was not true, I desired specially to come to state to you that I find that if those acres were put into statute acres, there would be about 400 additional acres; the number I stated was 2,032 acres held with the colleges; to that you must add 400 acres; this extra 400 I think is all held by the colleges, but I am not quite sure.

1675. Mr. Newdegate.] Have you any objection to state which is the county in which the customary measure exists?—Lancashire. Then as I gave you last time the total income from personal estate, which I did not intend to do when I first came, but which I gave at the desire of the Chairman and another honourable Member of the Committee, I think it well to give you the rental of the 1,600 acres with all the houses and buildings upon them that I mentioned as belonging to religious men, but not held with the colleges. The total rental of those 1,600 acres with divers buildings upon them of various descriptions, is 3,400*l.* a year, so that in truth the entire sum per annum which is applicable for all the purposes which I mentioned the other day, and which I need not here repeat, would be 10,350*l.* per annum, and 3,400*l.* per annum. Of course, those funds would all go for the same purpose. That gives you the total income of every sort and description, excepting, of course, course, the voluntary contributions of missions, which have nothing whatever to do with the inquiry. I am very sorry to have given the Committee the trouble to hear these corrections, but I had no authority last time to give this information.

1676. Mr. Sherlock.] Do you desire to add anything further?—No.

1677. Mr. Newdegate.] You have alluded to the lay brothers; you do not include among them the members of such societies as that of St. Vincent de Paul?—By no means; I am speaking of persons who are attached and live in the houses as lay brothers, in point of fact; just as your valet, for instance.

1678. Mr. Sherlock.] The society of St. Vincent de Paul is not a society of the regular order?—The society of St. Vincent de Paul consists of a multitude of people all over the world who give their regular contributions to see after the poor. It is not confined to religious men; there are tens of thousands of that society.

Mr. James Dewar, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Dewar.

1680. Mr. Newdegate.] I BELIEVE you were the late assessor of valuation of lands and heritages in the burgh of Perth?—I was.

1681. Do you know an institution on Kinnoull Hill, belonging, as you believe, to the Redemptorist order?—I do.

1682. Are you prepared to show the Committee the value of that house, and of the 18 acres of land therewith connected?—I am prepared to show the Committee the annual value, as assessed by the valuation appeal court; and I can also give a proximate estimate of the whole value of the house. The name of the property, as entered in the valuation roll, is St. Mary's Redemptory, Kinnoull Hill. First, "house," annual value, 300 l.; second, "grounds," 50 l. Those two sums were both reduced from the assessor's valuation by the appeal court; the one was reduced from 400 l. a year to 300 l., and the other from 150 l. to 50 l. The proprietor's name entered in the roll is "The Rev. Robert Austin Coffin and others, St. Mary's, 8, Clapham Park-road, Surrey, London, S."

1683. Have you seen the feu contract?—I am not aware that I have seen the principal copy of the feu contract; I do not know that I felt it necessary to see that paper in order to ascertain the value; but I have seen papers connected with the institution.

1684. With regard to the value you have supplied, it was your duty to attend to that when assessor for the burgh?—Yes.

1685. Have you seen a document in which it is said that this property is held in trust "for the members of the order of the Holy Redeemer in Scotland"?—I have seen such a paper.

1686. Can you produce that paper?—I am not able; I am afraid I could not get possession of it so as to produce it; I should feel it to be a breach of confidence if I did.

1687. Will you inquire, and supply it to the Committee if you are able to do so?—I shall be very happy if I can obtain it.

1688. Do you know the date of the contract between Lord Kinnoull on the one part, and certain priests on the other?—I am not sure of the date of the contract; the first entry in the roll was last August.

1689. What did that entry say?—The first entry in the roll for building went from Whit-Sunday 1869 to Whit-Sunday 1870; there had been an entry for ground in previous years; unoccupied ground.

1690. When was the building erected?—It was only completed so as to be taken into the last year's roll; it was going on in process of building for about two years, I think. The moment the property was acquired we put it in the roll, and entered the ground as unoccupied, such of it as was not occupied; and after the building was finished it was entered in the roll from Whit-Sunday 1869 to Whit-Sunday 1870, as occupied.

1691. You have mentioned the name of the Rev. Mr. Coffin: is he one of the contracting parties?—His name is in the paper that I saw.

1692. Is he supposed to be the local superior of the order?—He is supposed to be the superior of the order; but I understand that Mr. Vaughan is the superior of the institution.

1693. Then, Mr. Vaughan is the local superior?—Yes.

1694. Is he the Rev. Mr. Vaughan?—Yes, he is the Rev. Mr. Vaughan. He is described in the paper which I saw as "Clerk," along with the other clergymen.

1695. His name appears in the Roman Catholic Directory, at page 246, I think?—I am not able to answer that question.

1696. What was the document in which you saw his name; was it the document to which you before referred?—It was in some of the papers connected with the property.

1697. But to produce those papers, you require the permission of others?—Before I could make public use of them. I had access to them for my own purpose as assessor; but I am not aware that I have got access to them for any public use.

1698. That is one of the papers which you said you would ask permission to supply?—That is.

1699. Is there a power on the part of these owners to feu and to erect buildings?—There is, I believe.

1700. Can you produce the lithographed circular, dated the 24th July 1860, showing that the house is used as a retreat?—I am not able to produce a lithographed circular, but I can produce an attested copy, a true copy (producing it).

1701. Will you read that?—"St. Mary's, Kinnoull, Perth, 24th July 1869.—Dear Sir, I have the pleasure to inform you that we are now ready to receive into our house, for the spiritual exercises, any gentleman who may desire to make a few days' retreat; as, however, a public retreat, in which the meditations and instructions would be given aloud by one of the fathers of the community, would be to many more profitable or more easy than a private retreat, we propose to offer this advantage to those of the laity who may prefer to avail themselves of it. A public retreat for gentlemen will commence on Saturday, day, 7th August, at 7.30 p.m., and will close on the morning of Wednesday the 11th. We shall be happy to receive you, if you desire on that occasion to make a retreat; should this be your intention, I would request you to give me notice to that effect, not later than Tuesday the 3rd, in order that I may reserve a room for you.—I remain, dear Sir, yours most respectfully in Christ, Edmund Vaughan, C.S.S.R., Superior."

1702. Have you seen the original of that?—I have possession of the original of that.

1703. And in that document are the members of this institution described as a community?—I think they are; it says, "We are now ready to receive into our house, for the spiritual exercises, any gentleman who may desire to make a few days' retreat." Then the next thing is, "As, however, a public retreat in which the meditations and instructions would be given aloud by one of the fathers of the 'community,' would be to many more profitable, or more easy, than a private retreat, we propose to offer this advantage."

1704. I believe that you reside in the immediate neighbourhood of this institution?—I reside on the opposite side of the river from it.

1705. Have you seen any considerable number of the members of this community together?—I have frequently seen considerable numbers apparently of clergymen in the grounds.

1706. In a peculiar dress?—Sometimes in a peculiar dress.

1707. Not outside their own premises?—No; within their own grounds.

1708. How many have you seen together in the premises?—I could not say any number very specifically; but I should think that I have seen 10 or 12 at a time oftener than once.

1709. What was the kind of dress they wore?—Well, I think a peculiar cap and a gown; something of that sort.

1710. What was the colour?—Black, I think; I never paid much attention to that, not expecting ever to be asked any questions about it.

1711. But you did observe that these 10 or 12 whom you saw together within the boundaries of this property to which you allude were dressed in a gown and cap, and you think that the colour was black?—Certainly.

1712. It is understood, is it not, that this institution has had an accession of property, particularly from an officer of the army?—I am only able to speak about that from what I hear in public; but I have in a newspaper a statement upon the subject.

1713. What is the date of that newspaper?—May the 25th of this year.

1714. That is subsequent to your having ceased to be assessor?—Yes.

1715. Therefore the valuation which you give does not include the property to which that report refers?—It does not.

1716. Is this fact generally reported?—I have frequently heard it; and in that newspaper there is a story given, professedly upon the authority of a Catholic clergyman, as to where the money came from.

1717. I will only ask you this: it is generally believed that there has been an accession of property to that institution?—It is.

1718. Do you know anything of the character of this building, for you live in the immediate neighbourhood you say; is it a handsome building?—It is very much so indeed.

1719. How many storeys has it?—I suppose there are four or five storeys altogether; about four, I should think, from recollection.

1720. Do you know anything of the interior arrangements; did you see anything of the progress of the works during the erection?—I was through the house once or twice before it was opened, and I just have a general idea, but I have never been in it since.

1721. Will you give a description of what you saw?—That I have got in a newspaper.

1722. You say that you have an account in a newspaper; does that tally with what you saw yourself?—It does. All I can say is that it is a very handsome house, and that I have seen large rooms on the ground floor, the principal floor; I do not know for what purpose; some of them for dining, and other rooms for exercise; various purposes, I believe; and upstairs there are two galleries, I think, of what they call technically cells.

1723. What are they, small rooms opening into a gallery?—Yes, bed rooms; I have seen those; there are 22, I think, of them.

1724. Chairman.] They are upstairs, not underground?—They are not underground.

1725. Mr. Newdegate.] Did you go into the basement storey while it was building?—I have been there; I was through the whole house while it was building.

1726. Is the basement storey vaulted or arched?—I could not pretend to recollect that.

1727. There is an underground storey?—There is a very large underground storey, containing kitchens and other apartments usual in those places, such as sculleries, &c.

1728. Is there any small apartment in the basement storey?—I could not say that, for I do not think the place was sufficiently far advanced in building, when I was there, to be able to know that.

1729. The small rooms you saw are on the upper storey?—On the upper flats.

1730. Have you a copy of the valuation roll showing entry of proprietor in trust, and the yearly value?—The annual value I have already stated.

1731. Now there is another institution, which is a convent for females also, in Perth, with which you became acquainted, for the purposes of valuation, when assessor, is there not?—Yes.

1732. What is the name of that?—St. Joseph's convent.

1733. Is that so entered in your return?—It is so entered in the roll; situated in Stormont-street.

1734. Can you produce a copy of the valuation roll showing the entry of the proprietors in trust, and the yearly value of that institution?—I have that here.

1735. Will you read it?—The description of the property, is "St. Joseph's convent, situated at No. 8, Stormont-street, Perth;" under "proprietor" is entered "the trustees of the Catholic congregation, per Matthew Lynch, 56, Meal Vennel."

1736. Where is Meal Vennel?—In Perth. And the occupier is entered as Miss Elizabeth Langdale, the superior; I think she is the honourable Miss Elizabeth Langdale.

1737. What is the entry?—Just "Elizabeth Langdale."

1738. The date is what?—"For the year from Whit-Sunday 1869 to Whit-Sunday 1870," and the

21 June 1870.

the annual value is 72 l.; and the return for this year I saw also, and it is the same.

1739. Do you know what was the price of that house; you had to ascertain it in your assessment, I presume?—Yes; it cost upwards of 1,800 l. It was a house and garden.

1740. That was the cost of the building only?—That was the cost of the house. It was a house that they bought; the house cost the gentleman who built it I believe upwards of 2,000 l.; they occupied it as tenants for some years, and ultimately bought it themselves, and gave upwards of 1,800 l. for the house and grounds.

1741. Do you know the number of inmates?—Not certainly; I believe there are eight or nine ladies.

1742. There are other properties belonging to the Roman Catholic Church in Perth besides those you have named, are there not?—There are.

1743. What are the names of the trustees?—I do not know the names of the trustees; Mr. Lynch, the same gentleman whose name I have already mentioned, is the representative of them.

1744. The same gentleman is entered as proprietor?—Yes; the entry is, "the trustees of the Catholic congregation, per Matthew Lynch, 56, Meal Vennel."

1745. This appears to be all part of the same trust?—The convent, the chapel, the parsonage, and the schools have been represented to me as being precisely the same trust, but quite different from the other house at Kinnoull.

1746. There is nothing in the roll to contradict that, is there?—No, nothing.

1747. Can you give the value of these separate buildings?—I am not able to do that.

1748. I have forgotten to ask one question; is this redemptorist institution of which you first spoke known by any distinctive name since its erection?—It is called popularly and variously, I believe, sometimes St. Mary's and also the Redemptory. What the meaning of that term "Redemptory" may be I do not know, but that is a name by which it is very commonly known.

1749. That is the ordinary description of it?—That is the ordinary description of it.

1750. I believe that that establishment was opened by a ceremony?—The chapel was; a religious service.

1751. Mr. Sherlock.] Were you present at this service?—I was not present at it.

1752. Mr. Newdegate.] Were you in Perth, on the 31st of May 1870, when this service took place?—I think it was on Tuesday, the 24th, that it was opened.

1753. Were you there at the time?—I was outside the house; I was not in the chapel.

1754. You were outside, and were aware that there was a ceremony going on?—I was quite aware of the fact, and I had relatives and friends of my own in, during the service, and I was waiting for them to come out.

1755. Then you were literally on the premises?—I was not within the grounds; I was on the public road outside the grounds.

1756. But you were waiting for some of your relatives who were attending the ceremony?—I was; and I can have no doubt whatever about the ceremony having been performed, because over and above I have a lithograph circular inviting priests to be there.

1757. Will you read that circular?—The circular is dated 17th May 1870. "Reverend dear Sir,—The Redemptorist Fathers have the pleasure to announce to you their intention of opening on Tuesday, the 24th instant, the little church which they have erected in honor of Our Lady of Perpetual Succour, adjoining their house at Kinnoull. They will be happy to be favoured by the presence of your reverence on that occasion. The solemn mass which the very Reverend Dr. M'Pherson, V.G., has been invited to sing, will begin at 11.30. Complin and benediction at 4.30 p.m. I should be very grateful if you would kindly acquaint me with your intention to come; and I beg you to be so good as to bring cassock, surplice, and biretta. I remain, dear Reverend Sir, your most devoted servant in Christ, Edmund Vaughan, C.S.S.R."

1758. That is the person who is supposed to be the superior of the establishment?—Yes.

1759. Did you ever hear of a Reverend Dr. Smith, of Oakley?—Yes; he preached at the opening of the chapel.

1760. You were not present?—I was not present, but I am aware personally that he did.

1761. Your friends when they came out stated that he preached, did they not?—They stated that he did preach.

1762. Is there any copy of this sermon that can be verified?—It has appeared simultaneously in all the local newspapers, and, apparently, verbatim. I have one report before me in a Dundee newspaper, and it appeared, I believe, in three Perth newspapers; in two I know.

1763. Do you think you can produce evidence to prove the authenticity of this sermon, and furnish it to the Committee?—I fancy the reporter would be able to prove that, but I am not myself able to do so.

1764. Do you think that from the editors of these newspapers you could ascertain the authenticity of the notes from which this report of the sermon was printed?—I have no doubt whatever that I can, if the Committee wish it.

1765. And you will furnish that, and a copy of the sermon to this Committee if desired?—I will be very happy to have the copy, which is here, authenticated; I think I can get that done.

1766. Chairman.] You only have become acquainted with the facts that you have stated from the accident of your being the valuator or public officer that assess the parishes?—Yes; in the first instance from having to learn all about the value of the property.

1767. It is only from valuing this property in particular that you have become acquainted with its purposes?—No; I did not become acquainted with its purpose from valuing it, for in that capacity I had nothing to do with its purpose.

1768. It was accidentally, in valuing the property with a view to assessment, that you became acquainted with the purpose of the institution?—I saw some items of my information incidentally while acting as assessor.

1769. You assessed that, as you would assess any other property, without asking any other questions beyond those that would lead you to a correct impression of the value?—Yes.

1770. It is notorious then, is it not, that both these institutions are for religious purposes?—Yes, quite.

1771. The one is a monastery and the other is a convent?—The one was returned to the assessor as a convent by those acting for the owners; the other was returned as a house and grounds, but not any name given to it.

1772. But no objection was ever taken to that institution, that you are aware of, in your neighbourhood, because it was a monastery?—No, I am not aware of any. I never entered it as a monastery, because I am not quite sure that I know what a monastery is.

1773. But in the discharge of your duty you tried to ascertain who was the occupier and the owner?—I was quite entitled, in fact bound, to do that, and the result is here in the valuation roll.

1774. In making those inquiries, you became possessed of the information which you have given to the Committee?—Not the whole of it; but all the official part of it I have become possessed of in that way.

1775. You found somebody there who was avowedly the owner, and you discovered who was the responsible occupant?—Yes.

1776. In making your assessment, to whom do you apply in Scotland for the rates?—In this case to Mr. Vaughan for the rates.

1777. Your assessment is with a view to parochial rates?—Yes.

1778. To whom do you apply usually for rates; to the owner or occupier, or to both?—It depends upon whether the owner or the occupier is jointly liable or otherwise; but in this case the same party is liable for both tenant's and owner's rates, and Mr. Vaughan pays the whole, I believe.

1779. In some properties of a certain value, the owner and the occupier are jointly liable?—Yes.

1780. Was this property of such a nature that the owner alone was liable?—Yes.

1781. And you look to the superior?—We have no tenant given for this property. We have the proprietor given, represented by Mr. Vaughan, and we have the occupier also; so that the occupier is the same as the proprietor, and the proprietor is given as "Mr. Coffin, and others."

1782. Then, Mr. Vaughan appears to represent both occupier and owner?—Yes.

1783. And you rate him accordingly?—Yes.

1784. And is it the same with the other institution which you described; does the superior there, Miss Langdale, pay the rates?—No; I believe Mr. Lynch pays all the rates in the case of the convent. Miss Langdale is only the occupier, and is not called upon, I believe, for rates.

1785. In the entry or return made to you, does Mr. Lynch appear to be the person liable for the rates?—Yes, he represents the trustees, as their factor, I suppose.

1786. Do you estimate that property according to the usual principles upon which you determine value?—Quite so. In the case of the convent, the yearly value was fixed by the sum that they paid while tenants themselves to another proprietor.

1787. You take rent as evidence of the rateble value?—Yes; we continued that after they acquired the property themselves; they appealed last year to have it taken down from 72 l. to 60*l.*, but the appeal was refused.

1788. You do not refer at all to the occupation of the inmates, or to the proceeds arising from their duties?—Not at all.

1789. You look upon them precisely as other owners and occupiers?—Precisely as other owners and occupiers, and citizens.

1790. You do not, from being in that neighbourhood, ever hear any objections to these institutions, do you?—No, I cannot say that I do.

1791. People do not point to them, or at least to the institution occupied by them, as belonging to an order that is illegal?—It certainly is looked upon as being an institution for religious purposes, for persons connected with the Church of Rome; but I am not aware that any prejudice attaches to it on that account.

1792. But you do not hear anybody complain that the institutions are illegal; that they are not sanctioned by law?—No, I cannot say that I have heard that.

1793. Are you aware of the manner in which the men live there, or what duties they perform. Do they attend schools, or attend hospitals, or do you know exactly what their occupations are?—No; I do not know anything more than what I see in Doctor Smith's sermon, and in those circulars.

1794. You spoke of the property being held between the trustees; had you anthing to do with those trustees?—Nothing.

1795. How did you become acquainted with the fact of there being trustees independent of the person whom you rated for the property?—It was my business to inquire who the owners of this property were, and who were to be liable for it, and I found on making inquiry that some half-dozen gentlemen were said to hold the property in trust for another community, and I just took the name of the responsible person, that of the gentleman who gave me the return himself.

1796. You were satisfied with knowing who were the responsible owners?—Yes.

1797. But you heard that Mr. Vaughan was not actually the owner, but was only living there as a person placed there by the trustees?—I understood so.

1798. Do you know how long the trustees have held that property?—Not more than three years.

1799. Are they gentlemen of the neighbourhood?—No, I think they are most of them clergymen living at a distance.

1800. I think you described them as living at Clapham?—Mr. Coffin lives in London, and Mr. Vaughan resides on the property.

1801. Did Mr. Vaughan come from London?—I do not know where he came from.

1802. The trustees then live in London, and the person that they placed there as the owner or occupier of the property comes from London, does he not?—I cannot tell where he comes from. Mr. Vaughan gives in the return to the assessor, as being the responsible party for the rates, and we are quite satisfied with his name.

1803. But as far as you know, the trustees and Mr. Vaughan are strangers to the district?—Yes, they are strangers to the district.

1804. Was there ever an institution of that kind before in the district?—Never, as far as I know.

1805. About three years ago the building commenced, as I understand?—Yes, speaking from recollection, I should say so.

1806. Did they build it from the ground, or did they buy some mansion?—No, they feud the ground, and built it from the foundation.

1807. They took the ground from Lord Kinnoull?—They took the ground from Lord Kinnoull.

1808. On a lease?—They took it on a perpetual feu, for an annual payment of 128 l. 16 s 6 d.; it is their property, I understand, so long as they pay the feu, but if they do not pay the feu the property becomes irritated, and goes to the superior.

1809. Did they pay nothing originally?—I do not think that any grassum, any capital sum, was paid, to begin with, but the payment was commuted into an annual payment of 128 l. 16 s. 6 d., and that is more than the arable value of the ground.

1810. Then as long as they pay that yearly amount the owner has no right to re-enter?—No, none whatever; there are 18 acres, and some odd parts of an acre altogether.

1811. Is that let off?—No, all occupied by themselves.

1812. In what way?—The house occupies a considerable portion; then there are grounds, very pleasant grounds, laid out, and I think there is a kitchen garden behind.

1813. Do the inmates cultivate the ground themselves?—No, they have had gardeners laying it out; probably they may keep it up themselves, but I do not know.

1814. I mean, is it ground only for the purpose of the institution?—Only for that.

1815. Do the poor resort to it for any purpose?—Not as yet, so far as I know.

1816. No alms are given from that house?—Not that I know of.

1817. And you do not know that any objection is taken in the neighbourhood to the institution?—No objection, that I ever heard of. There is just the prejudice which you might expect in a Protestant community to a new Catholic institution of this kind; nothing else.

1818. No demonstration against it?—Certainly not; they are always treated with the utmost respect by every gentleman and lady, so far as I ever heard.

1819. Is that state of things resulting from any change lately?—I cannot say; I understand that Dr. Smith gave the community of Perth great praise for the courtesy which they have shown.

1820. Mr. Jessel.] Do you know whether these gentlemen do anything; whether they are occupied either in preaching or in parish work, or teaching, or anything of that kind?—I know nothing whatever of them beyond what Dr. Smith mentions in his sermon.

1821. Now about the ladies in the convent; do they do anything?—I think half of them are employed in teaching, or otherwise employed in the penitentiary, statedly.

1822. Do you mean alternately?—I do not know that, but three or four of them alternately go there regularly every day, and the others are employed in teaching a juvenile school in the middle of the town.

1823. They are all usefully employed, in fact?—Yes, those ladies are all employed, I think.

1824. Chairman.] I think you said that you saw about 12 or 13 gentlemen in a peculiar dress?—I should not like to condescend very exactly upon the number, but I should think that there must have been at least 10 or 12, oftener than once.

1825. But they never leave the grounds in that dress?—No; I never saw them out of the grounds in that dress.

1826. Mr. Matthews.] I do not know whether you have read through any deed relating to this?—No, I have not read through any deed; I necessarily had access to deeds.

1827. Did you know anything more of the contents of the deed than that there were certain persons named as the owners of the property?—What I saw was, that half a dozen or more of those clerical gentlemen were named as holders of the property in trust for a religious order.

1828. Did you read the terms of the trust there?—No; I never read a single thing in such matters, excepting what I was obliged to read.

1829. Mr. Sherlock.] You are not officially engaged now in assessing?—Not now.

1830. Have you any reason to suppose that there has been any accession of property to this institution since you have ceased to be officially connected with the assessment?—Yes, there has been a very elegant chapel built since, and it was opened in May last.

1831. Do you know the present official valuation?—It is the same as that of last year; the roll is not made up for this year yet; but I think that Mr. Vaughan's return is the same as last year.

1832. The house is valued at 300 l. a year?—Yes; I put it in at 400 l. last year, but the appeal court reduced it to 300 l.

1833. We may take it that the value, as decided by the authorities, is 300 l. for the house, and 50 l. for the grounds?—Yes.

1834. Subject to how much rent payable to Lord Kinnoull?—£. 128. 16. 6., the feu duty.

1835. So that to ascertain the exact value to the occupiers, you must deduct, of course, the feu duty from the valuation?—That is between themselves; I do not know about that; they have to pay that money, of course, every year: but to that 300 l. will fall to be added the annual value of the chapel, whatever it may be.

1836. Are the public admitted to that chapel?—Yes, admitted and invited, I think.

1837. That is for the accommodation of the Roman Catholic congregation in the neighbourhood, I suppose?—No; the Roman Catholic congregation are provided for otherwise in their own chapel in town; but the little chapel in Kinnoull is open to all and sundry.

1838. Do you mean that gentlemen not professing the Roman Catholic religion are there?—It has only been a week or two open, but I have no doubt that many will step in to see it; it only holds 200 people altogether.

1839. It is open to the public?—Yes.

1840. Have you been in it?—The Saturday before it was opened I was in it; I have not been in it since.

1841. Mr. Matthews.] On what principle do you value chapels?—The principle on which I valued chapels in Perth was 3 s. per sitting for a good substantially built house, because that is about the annual value of the capital necessary for building a plain church; but older churches we let off at a smaller figure, probably 1 s. 6 d. a sitting. This little chapel on Kinnoull Hill only holds 200 chairs, and I do not think that it can be valued for more than 200 sittings, like other churches. The Roman Catholic chapel in Melville-street is valued the same as every other church in the place, according to the number of sittings in it.

1842. Chairman.] That chapel has existed for some time past, has it not?—Yes, many years.

1843. What is the ministry there; are there parish priests living in Perth that attend it?—Yes.

1844. And the congregation there attends it, and does not go to this new church?—The new church would not be suitable for that congregation; ion; it is out of the way, and they have a large congregation in Melville-street.

1845. Partly from being a considerable distance, nd partly for other reasons, you say that there s no communication between this new establishnent and the old church?—I do not think there s; there has not been any time for that, for one hing.

1846. Are the Catholics there, Scotch or Irish? —Mostly Irish, so far as my opinion and knowledge go.

1847. So far as you know the new institution, hey are not Irish then?—The use of the chapel I understand is confined to the inmates of the house, and it is open to the public so far as available otherwise.

21 June 1870.

1848. But did they come from England?—I cannot tell where they came from.

1849. Mr. Newdegate.] According to your evidence, it is about four months since this institution was formally opened; how long is it since this institution was occupied?—It is more than a twelvemonth; at least a twelvemonth.

1850. It was on the 24th of May, I think, that it was formally opened?—That was the chapel in connection with the house; the house itself was opened a year ago and more.

Mr. John Macmillan Robertson, called in; and Examined.

1851. Mr. Newdegate.] I believe that you are a Solicitor in Glasgow?—I am.

1852. Can you produce extracts from the burgh registers of Lanark showing holders of property, those holders being the Vincentian Fathers at Lanark, and the Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul?—I have extracts here for both what is occupied by the Vincentian Fathers and also by the Sisters of Charity. The titles to all the properties there occupied by these parties are in precisely the same terms.

1853. Will you read the terms?—I read from the Disposition of Smyllum Park (which is the name of one of these properties), recorded on 12th November 1864. By that deed the property is disponed to the "Right Reverend Doctor John Murdoch, Vicar Apostolic of the Western District of Scotland, the Very Reverend Thomas M'Namara, of St. Vincent's, Castleknock, in Ireland, Visitor of the Irish Province of the Congregation of the Mission, and Robert Monteith, Esquire, of Carstairs, in the county of Lanark, and to the successors in office respectively of the said Right Reverend Doctor John Murdoch, as Vicar Apostolic of the Western District of Scotland, and of the said Very Reverend Thomas M'Namara, as Visitor of the said Irish Province of the congregation aforesaid, and the heirs or legal representatives of the said Robert Monteith, in the room and place of the said parties herein named on the failure of such parties respectively; but that in trust always for the uses and purposes, and under the conditions and declarations, specified and set forth in an agreement relative to the establishment at Lanark, of a community of the said congregation of the mission, entered into between the said Robert Monteith on the one part, and the Very Reverend Philip Dawley, then of Castleknock aforesaid, and Visitor of the said Irish Province of the Congregation of the Mission, on the other part, with the approval of the said Right Reverend Doctor John Murdoch, dated the 13th and 14th days of January, and the 16th day of February, all in the year 1860."

1854. Is that a true copy?—It is a true copy of the disposition under which the property was acquired.

1855. And as registered?—Yes, as registered.

1856. Can you state the extent of the property?—It is fully 100 acres; about 113 acres.

1857. Can you state the money paid for the property?—Yes; the deed bears that it is 8,000*l.*

1858. Now is this property held for the Vincentian Fathers and for the Sisters of Charity, under the same trust?—The estate of Smyllum Park is now occupied by the Sisters of Charity alone; the property occupied by the Vincentian Fathers is near to it, but stands on separate titles conceived in the very same terms.

Mr. Robertson.

1859. Are there two titles?—There are more than two, because the property was acquired at different times; they have been going on gradually purchasing piece by piece, as it was found to suit. The deed from which I have just read is the title to the largest portion.

1860. Have you got that which relates to the other portion?—Yes; the first entry on the register is under date 19th December 1860, and relates to the subjects on which the chapel and schools are erected, the title to which is taken to the Right Reverend Doctor John Murdoch, Vicar Apostolic of the Western District of Scotland; the Very Reverend Philip Dowley, of St. Vincent, Castleknock in Ireland, Visitor of the Irish Province of the Congregation of the Mission; and Robert Monteith, Esquire, of Carstairs, in the county of Lanark, the trust purposes being the same as in the deed I have just read. Then upon the same day there were registered two other deeds applicable to ground adjoining, in favour of the same parties, and also upon the same terms of trust.

1861. Mr. Matthews.] Will you read those?—The one is to "The Right Reverend Doctor John Murdoch, Vicar Apostolic of the Western District of Scotland, the Very Reverend Philip Dowley, of St. Vincent, Castleknock, in Ireland, Visitor of the Irish Province of the Congregation of the Mission, and Robert Monteith, Esq."; and the other is to the same persons for another piece of ground acquired in the same way, also adjoining, and upon the same terms of trust.

1862. What are the terms of trust of the second?—The terms of trust are identical with what I have read from the Smyllum Park title; I compared them all, and found them to correspond.

1863. Mr. Newdegate.] What you have given is the cost of the property, the site of the building?—Of Smyllum Park only, and that does not include some other properties adjoining to Smyllum Park, which they have since purchased, and now hold upon the same terms of trust.

1864. Can you give the cost of the building, or an approximation to it?—The cost of the chapel and schools, and of an hospital adjoining, will not be less than 18,000*l.*, including also a residence to the fathers.

1865. I think this is commonly known as the Smyllum Institution?—The place occupied by the Sisters of Charity is known by that name.

1866. I think that that is described in the Roman Catholic Directory, at page 134?—Yes, it is.

1867. Will you read the extract referring to it?—

it?—It begins at page 132, and extends over 133 and part of 134.

1868. You believe that to be a correct description?—I have no doubt of it.

1869. And is there any mention there of prayers for the dead?—There is.

1870. Will you read it?—At page 134 I read as follows: "The holy sacrifice of the Mass is offered once every fortnight for the members, living and dead, and their subscribers. Each member recites a pater and ave daily for the same pious intention; and after the death of each member three Masses will be celebrated, and the orphans will recite the Rosary of the Blessed Virgin each day for one week, for her eternal repose."

1871. That is understood to identify this as a Roman Catholic institution, is it not?—Yes; this same account from which I have read concludes as follows: "Ladies wishing to join the association will please apply to the Sister Superioress, St. Mary's Orphanage, Lanark, to whom all communications connected with the association are to be directed." The terms upon which children are received are also stated.

1872. Can you produce the form of bequest to the orphanage, as appearing in the fifth annual report?—Yes; I hold in my hand the fifth annual report of "St. Mary's Catholic Male and Female Orphanage, with a statement of accounts, list of subscribers, donations, &c."

1873. What is the form of bequest?—The form of bequest is in these words: "I [ ], give and bequeath the sum of [ ], (sum in words) sterling, to the Superioress, for the time being, of the Roman Catholic Orphanage, situate at Smyllum, Lanark, upon trust to apply the same, and every part thereof, for the uses and purposes of the said institution; and I direct that the receipt of such Superioress shall be a sufficient discharge for this bequest."

1874. That is considered an instruction to those who intend to contribute to that institution?—Yes; it is so put; it is headed "Form of bequest."

1875. What is the date of that report?—The year to which the report applies is from the 22nd of August 1868 to the 22nd of August 1869.

1876. Who published that report?—If you mean the person who printed it, it bears to have been printed at Lanark, by "Robert Wood, 97, High-street, 1869."

1877. It is a report of this institution, is it not?—It is.

1879. Can you produce an extract from the valuation rolls of the burgh and county of Lanark, so far as they relate to the property in Lanark?—Yes, I have that here. In the valuation roll of the county of Lanark, for the year 1869–70, the Sisters of Charity are entered as the proprietors, and also as occupiers of the mansion-house of Smyllum Park; and it is stated there, at a rental of 70 l. The old mansion-house has been converted into an orphanage. Then the "land and policies" (that is, pleasure grounds) are entered at 109 l. Then there is a house let to a Thomas Paterson, at 10 l.

1880. Is that separate?—That is separate. It is part of the ground acquired under this 8,000 l. purchase, and it is let off to a Thomas Paterson, by the Sisters of Charity, for 10 l. Then there are two houses also let off, but as they are under 4 l., the names of the tenants are not given; the annual rental of the two is 5 l. And there is another house let to John Weir, at 4 l. 5 s. There is another piece of land, also occupied by the Sisters of Charity, but of which "the trustees of the Roman Catholic congregation" are entered as the proprietor, of the value of 18 l. These are the entries in the roll for the county of Lanark; but then the other properties upon which the chapel and the hospital and the residence of the fathers are entered, are in the burgh of Lanark.

1881. What are your extracts in respect to them?—The hospital is entered as belonging to the "Trustee of the Roman Catholic congregation, per Sisters of Charity, Smyllum, Lanark," of the annual value of 34 l., and the Sisters of Charity are entered as the tenants of it.

1882. Are the names of the trustees there given?—The names of the trustees are not given in the valuation roll; there is a small house adjoining entered as belonging to the same proprietors, and is in the same occupation, and stated to be of the value of 2 l.; besides these there are several houses, also adjoining the chapel, all of which are entered as belonging to the Roman Catholic congregation, with the words "per Rev. M. Mullen, Lanark," added. Of these one is empty, of the value of 10 l.; another is occupied by the Rev. M. Mullen, at 22 l.; another is occupied by the Roman Catholic school teacher, of the value of 22 l. 10 s.; James Langhan, a gardener, occupies one of the value of 2 l.; the Sisters of Charity occupy one of the value of 2 l.; another, which is empty, is of the value of 1 l. 10 s.; then there are two schools occupied by the Roman Catholic congregation of the value of 25 l.; and land occupied by the Rev. Mr. Mullen of the value of 10 l.; then there is another entry of property as belonging to the "Trustees of the Roman Catholic Congregation, per Robert Monteith, of Carstairs, per Morrison and Marr, Writers, Lanark"; the tenants and occupants of which are, respectively, Hugh Larkie, 3 l.; Andrew Keogan, 3 l.; Serjeant John Miller, 6 l.; Serjeant George Dowrie, 8 l., and the Sisters of Charity, 8 l.

1883. Now, I wish to go to another property; can you produce an extract from the valuation roll of property in Glasgow, entered as belonging to Jesuits and other orders?—The extract that I have in my hand is from the valuation roll for the burgh of Glasgow for the year 1869–70, and the following are entries taken from it: "The Rev. Alfred Weld and others, per T. B. Parkinson, 40, North Woodside-road," as entered as proprietors of a school at 21, Dalhousie-street, and the tenant is stated to be "the Rev. Alfred Weld and others." There the proprietor is also the occupant. This school is stated to be of the annual value of 150 l. The chapel adjoining is entered in the same way, and is stated to be of the annual value of 80 l. These are both in Dalhousie-street. The proprietor of 27, Rose-street, which immediately adjoins the property before referred to, is stated to be "the Rev. Alfred Weld and others, per T. B. Parkinson, 40, Woodside-road" (the same entry as for 21, Dalhousie-street), and the tenant there is stated to be Mary E. Dowd, and the value to be 50 l. For 31, Rose-street, the entry is the same, and the value is stated at 50 l. From the Catholic Directory it appears that Mary E. Dowd represents the Sisters of Mercy, and it also appears that the school referred to here is taught by the Jesuit Fathers.

Fathers. That appears at pages 126 and 174 of the Roman Catholic Directory for Scotland for this year. It is there stated that "the school is entirely under the direction of the Society of Jesus."

1884. Is there any further property there?—These are the entries for the property at the place you refer to, supposed to be held by the Jesuit Fathers.

1885. Now I will go to another property: can you produce a copy of the disposition in favour of certain parties described as Passionists?—Yes.

1886. Mr. Matthews.] Is this registered also?—It is also registered. This property was conveyed "to, and in favour of, the Right Reverend John Gray, Roman Catholic bishop, residing in Glasgow, vicar apostolic of the Western District of Scotland, the Reverend Eugene Martorelli, Roman Catholic clergyman, residing in London, provincial of the religious order or community, known by the name of the 'Passionists,' the Reverend Osmond Maguire, the Reverend Benjamin Lomax, the Reverend James Bonnyman, the Reverend Joseph O'Grady, and the Reverend Raphael Gorga, all Roman Catholic clergymen residing in Glasgow, and the acceptors or acceptor, survivors or survivor, of them, and the heir of the last survivor of them (the majority for the time resident in Great Britain and Ireland, being always a quorum)."

1887. Can you state the valuation and extent of that property?—That property is entered in the valuation roll from which I have already read as Nos. 38 to 34, Parson-street. The proprietor is there stated to be "the St. Mungo Roman Catholic Chapel, per Reverend Anselm Lomax and others," and the occupant is stated to be "the Reverend Anselm Lomax and others," and the rental 50 l.

1888. Mr. O'Reilly.] You read "chapel;" is that a chapel or a house?—The entry is "House, &c." There is no entry of the chapel, because in general places of worship are not entered in the valuation roll of the city. After a chapel has been newly erected, the registrar, in order to show that he has observed it, makes an entry of the chapel, and gives a certain annual value to it; but as the taxes in general are not leviable upon their value, they do not keep up the entry of them. As to the extent, I can only state the extent as it appears from the titles, and it is stated there at 3,683 square yards and 7 square feet, or thereabouts.

1889. Mr. Newdegate.] I will now go to another property held by the Franciscans, in Cumberland-street, Glasgow; can you produce an extract from the feu contract?—I regret to say that I have mislaid that extract; I had it with the other extracts, but after looking over the papers I brought with me this morning, I suspect that I have left it behind.

1890. When you find it will you supply it to the Committee?—Yes.

1891. And that will include the value and extent of the property from the roll?—Yes; the value is there given both of the school, the priory, and the chapel.

1892. That will be part of your evidence as a true copy?—Yes.

1893. Then I will pass on to another property: there is, I believe, a property held by Bishop Murdoch and others, in St. Mungo's, Glasgow, belonging to, and for the benefit of, the Marist Brothers; will you give a description of that property?—That property is entered in the valuation roll as belonging to "the Rev. Eugene Small, 52, Great Clyde-street," and the tenant is stated to be the "Marist Brothers, per Rev. Osmond Maguire;" the annual value is stated to be 50 l.

1894. Mr. O'Reilly.] What is it stated to be?—"House and school;" but the brothers reside there.

1895. Mr. Jessel.] Can you say what these Marist Brothers are?—I can only say what they are from the Roman Catholic Directory.

1896. Mr. Matthews.] How do you identify the persons to whom the Directory relates with the property mentioned in the valuation roll?—The address is given.

1897. Mr. Jessel.] Are they Jesuits, or not?—No. "This congregation, known through the British Isles as the 'Marist Brothers,' was founded in 1817, by the late Abbé Champagnat, at Lavala, in the diocese of Lyons." "The rapidity with which the institute has spread throughout France, its subsequent progress in Belgium, England, Scotland, Ireland, Oceanica, Syria, and the Cape of Good Hope, the ever-increasing demand in the above countries and many others for the services of the brothers, seem to be the facts alluded to by the Holy Father as evident marks of Divine favour, while they are to us happy auguries of extensive future usefulness and unmistakeable proofs of the adaptation of our constitutions and system to meet certain wants and requirements of our age." I read that from page 126 of the Catholic Directory.

1898. Do you know what they are really; can you tell us whether they are a monastic order or not?—I know nothing of them personally; I think that I have seen them in the street; that is all. "The brothers conduct poor schools, middle-class day and evening schools and boarding schools. They cordially co-operate in the methods approved by the patrons for meeting all school expenses, and in securing all educational grants given on honourable terms, as presently enjoyed by English and Scottish Catholics."

1900. What are the purposes mentioned?—These parties are said to hold the property "under the declarations, conditions, and provisions following; namely, first, that the trustees for the time shall hold the said subjects and others in trust for the religious and educational purposes, either or both of the Roman Catholic congregation of Saint Mungo's aforesaid; secondly, that the said trustees for the time, and the survivors and survivor of them, shall have full power and discretion in the use and management of the said subjects for the purposes aforesaid, without control or interference by any individual or individuals whomsoever; and thirdly, that the said trustees for the time, and the survivors and survivor of them, shall have full power, with the consent and concurrence of the Roman Catholic bishop and vicar apostolic in the Western District of Scotland for the time, but not otherwise, to sell and convey the aforesaid subjects, or any part whereof, and to borrow money on the security thereof, and the purchasers or lenders shall have no concern with, or right to inquire into, the application of the price or prices received, or sums borrowed by them."

1901. Is that all the information that you have to give with respect to this property?—I think so.

1902. Passing now to another property, can you produce an extract from the register of sasines, showing the trust and extent of property held in Glasgow for the Sisters of Mercy?—Yes, a property at Garngad-hill was conveyed "to Teresa Mary Rigg, Elizabeth Dowd, Jane White, Jane Anne Hope Johnstone, and Mary M'Donald, all residing in Glasgow, and the survivors and survivor of them, in trust for the religious and educational purposes of the establishment called 'the Sisters of Mercy,' in Glasgow; declaring that a majority of the said trustees above named, or of those to be assumed by them, as after mentioned, acting and resident in Scotland at the time, shall at all times form a quorum, and that the said trust shall continue, and be, permanently maintained, upon the appointment or assumption of new trustees by the said trustees above named, or the survivors or survivor of them, which they and she shall have full power to do at pleasure; and that the said Teresa Mary Rigg, Elizabeth Dowd, Jane White, Jane Anne Hope Johnstone, and Mary M'Donald, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the person or persons to be assumed as aforesaid as trustees aforesaid, or their said quorum, shall have full power to sell and dispose of the lands and others, after disponed by public roup or private bargain, and to borrow money on the security of the said lands and others, and to grant, execute, and deliver all deeds and writings necessary of these purposes, and that without the consent or concurrence of any party whatever; and that the purchasers or lenders shall have no concern with, or right to inquire into, the application of the price or prices received, or of the sums borrowed by the said trustees, or the purposes of the said trust." That is the extract of one deed; and I have another extract from a deed, conveying to the Sisters of Mercy a property in St. Mungo-street, but not to the same trustees. This latter deed bears to have been granted "in consideration of the sum of 1,825 l. sterling, instantly paid to me by Teresa Mary Rigg, Elizabeth Dowd, Jane White, Jane Anne Hope Johnstone, Mary Curran, and Helen Strachan, all presently residing at Hill House, Garngad-hill, Glasgow, for behoof of the community of the Sisters of Mercy, in Glasgow, as the price of the said subjects, and others, of which sum I hereby acknowledge the receipt;" and the property is sold, alienated, and disponed to the said Teresa Mary Rigg and other ladies named, "and the survivors and survivor of them, in trust for the religious and educational purposes of the establishment or community called the Sisters of Mercy, in Glasgow; declaring that a majority of the said trustees above named, or of those to be assumed by them as after mentioned, acting and resident in Scotland at the time, shall at all times form a quorum; and that the said trust shall continue and be permanently maintained, upon the appointment or assumption of new trustees, by the said trustees above named, or the survivors or survivor of them, which they and she shall have full power to do at pleasure."

1903. Is that a complete extract?—Yes.

1904. Mr. O'Reilly.] Then the value of that is, what?—The annual value of the property at Garngad-hill is stated at 290 l.

1905. What is it described as?—"House and ground." And there is another entry at the same place of "house and ground," at 19 l., the tenant of which is stated to be Patrick M'Guire, foreman. I have to explain that in the valuation roll the proprietor is stated to be "Roman Catholic trustees, per Madame Aimie Des Anges."

1906. Mr. Newdegate.] That is a correct extract from the valuation roll?—Yes.

1907. I think that that is all the information that you are prepared to give with respect to the property of the Sisters of Mercy?—I wish to explain that this property is entered in the valuation roll as being occupied by the Little Sisters of Poor.

1908. You will have some further evidence to give upon the Little Sisters of Poor, will you not?—Yes.

1909. Mr. Matthews.] These are also Glasgow ladies, as I understand?—It is Glasgow property.

1910. Mr. Newdegate.] Now, I have to ask you whether you can produce a copy of an instrument of sasine, showing a trust and the extent of property on which Franciscan nuns are located?—Yes, in the city of Glasgow. These ladies are located in Charlotte-street, as stated at page 175 of the Catholic Directory. That property stands vested, according to this instrument of sasine, in the "Right Rev. Dr. John Murdoch, Roman Catholic bishop and vicar apostolic in the western district of Scotland, residing in Glasgow; the Right Rev. Dr. Alexander Smith, Roman Catholic bishop and coadjutor vicar apostolic in the said western district of Scotland, residing in Glasgow; the Rev. John Grey, Roman Catholic clergyman, residing in Glasgow; the Rev. Peter Forbes, Roman Catholic clergyman, residing in Glasgow; the Rev. William Gordon, Roman Catholic clergyman, residing at Greenock; the Rev. Michael Condon, Roman Catholic clergyman, residing at Hamilton; and the Rev. Thomas Coddy, Roman Catholic clergyman, residing in Glasgow, as trustees after mentioned." And the property is conveyed to these parties, "and to any other person or persons to be appointed to act along with or to succeed them in manner thereinafter provided, and to the survivors or survivor of his said disponees, the majority for the time resident in Scotland, being a quorum, and to the assignees of the said trustees, declaring always, as it was by said disposition so produced, expressly provided and declared, that the said trustees, and their successors in office, should hold the said subjects for the uses and purposes, and with the powers, and under the conditions and provisions following; that was to say, first, the trustees for the time should hold the said ground, and all buildings already erected, or which might be from time to time erected thereupon, in trust for the educational purposes of the Roman Catholic congregation in connection with the church of St. Andrew, Great Clyde-street, Glasgow; and in particular, they should so hold the said aid subjects for a school-house or school-houses, ither or both, or for any other purpose in connection with the educational purposes aforesaid. Second, the said trustees for the time should ave the most full and ample powers in the se and management of the said subjects for ehoof foresaid, without control or right of nterference in any way by any individual or ndividuals; but it should not be lawful to, nor n the power of, the said trustees, except with he consent and approbation of the said Right Rev. Dr. John Murdoch, or of the Roman Catholic bishop or vicar-apostolic for the time in he said western district of Scotland, or other istrict or division within which the said congregation might for the time be situated, to sell or ispose the foresaid subjects or any part thereof, r to burden or contract debt upon the same; ut it should be lawful for the said trustees for he time, with such consent and approbation, to o any of the said acts, the price or prices, or ums borrowed, being to be applied or used by he said trustees for the time in such way and manner as the said Right Rev. Dr. John Murdoch, or the said Roman Catholic bishop or vicarpostolic for the time might direct, but with vhich application or use purchasers or lenders hould have no concern. Third. The trust by aid disposition so produced, created, should, so ong as the said subjects were held for the purposes before mentioned, continue and be permanently maintained, upon the appointment of ew trustees by the said Right Rev. Dr. John Murdoch, or by the Roman Catholic bishop or icar-apostolic officiating for the time in the said estern district of Scotland, or other district or ivision within which the foresaid congregation ight for the time be situated, which appointment of new trustees should be made by the aid Right Rev. Dr. John Murdoch, or by the aid bishop or vicar apostolic for the time by a riting under his hand, from time to time and as ften as he should see proper. Fourth. Each and very trustee so to be appointed should in the ame manner, and as effectually as if he had been amed in said disposition so produced, stand fully ested in the said subjects thereby conveyed, and hould hold the same, subject to such and the like usts, and with and under the powers and provions which are therein contained."

1911. That is a full extract?—That is a full xtract of one part of the Charlotte-street proerty; but there is another property, the trustees amed in the title to which are the Right Rev. ohn Murdoch, D.D., Roman Catholic Bishop in lasgow, and Vicar Apostolic of the Western istrict of Scotland; Right Rev. Dr. Alexander mith, Roman Catholic Bishop in Glasgow; Rev. Villiam Gordon, Roman Catholic clergyman ere; Rev. Peter Forbes, Roman Cathlic clerman there; Rev. Archibald Chisholm, Roan Catholic clergyman there; Rev. Charles I'Kenzie, Roman Catholic clergyman, Paisley; ev. James Smith, Roman Catholic clergyman, amilton; Rev. John Grey, Roman Catholic ergyman, Glasgow; Rev. John Shaw, Roman atholic clergyman there; and Rev. Alexander unro, Roman Catholic clergyman, Duntocher; and to the survivors or survivor of them, and the sponees or disponee of the survivors or survivor them, excluding all legal heirs whatsoever, the ajor number surviving and resident in Scotland om time to time being always a quorum."

1912. Chairman.] Was that for the same purposes as the other?—The purposes of the trust, as given in the former deed, are not repeated in this deed.

21 June 1870.

1913. Mr. Matthews.] Is there any expression of its being on the same trust?—No.

1914. Then there is no trust?—No trust, except that the disposative clause indicates a trust.

1915. Mr. Newdegate.] Can you show from the valuation roll the extent of these two properties and their annual values?—They are both entered the same way; the one is 62 to 64, Charlotte-street; the proprietor is there stated to be "Franciscan convent, per James Connelly, 43, Great Clyde-street;" the tenant is stated to be "Franciscan convent, per Madame McIntosh," and the yearly value is stated at 50*l.* The next entry is from 56 to 58, Charlotte-street; the proprietor is the same as in the former entry, and the tenant is stated to be "Franciscan convent, per Madame McSwiney," and the rent or annual value is stated at 150*l.*

1916. Chairman.] But who is entered there as the owner?—The "Franciscan convent, per James Connelly."

1917. In what capacity is he entered there?—Where an entry of this kind occurs, it is usually the name of the person by whom the return is made. If the return does not disclose the names of the proprietors, then the person making the return is put in as having made the return in this form.

1918. But who is liable for the rates?—I would suppose that James Connelly would be liable if he made a return in this form; but of course everything in the property would be liable for the rates.

1919. There are reasons why the owner or occupiers must be inserted. They acquire certain rights, according to the payment of rates, do they not?—Yes.

1920. Mr. Newdegate.] Is that all that you have to state in respect of those two properties?—I think so.

1921. Then I will pass to another property. Can you produce extracts from three deeds, showing the extent and value of property held by eight nuns of the Good Shepherd convent, in the vicinity of Glasgow?—Yes. The convent of the Good Shepherd is at Dalbeth; the register shows the proprietors of that property to be "the Right Rev. Dr. John Murdoch, Roman Catholic Bishop, residing in Glasgow, the Rev. William Gordon, the Rev. Peter Forbes, the Rev. John Grey, and the Rev. John Shaw, all Roman Catholic clergymen in Glasgow, the Rev. Alexander Smith, Roman Catholic clergyman in Airdrie, the Rev. Charles M'Kenzie, Roman Catholic clergyman in Dumbarton, and the Rev. James Smith, Roman Catholic clergyman in Hamilton;" "and to the survivors or survivor of them, the major number alive and resident in Scotland for the time being always a quorum, and to the disponees of them, or the survivors or survivor of them, secluding all legal heirs."

1922. Mr. Matthews.] Are there any trusts there?—There do not appear to be any trusts there.

1923. Chairman.] But is that the entry for those names that you have been reading of proprietors?—Yes; the parties that stand vested in the property shown by the public registers.

1924. And no other names mentioned?—No other names mentioned.

21 June 1870.

1925. No regard to occupation?—I was going to explain that these gentlemen sold a piece of this property afterwards to Anne Keasley, Frances Power, and Mary Nordlolen, all spinsters, and residing at Hammersmith, near London, and Emma Henrietta Rambach, spinster, sometime residing at Hammersmith aforesaid, thereafter at Caen in Normandy; and the now deceased Eliza Daniel and Mary Lowe; and these ladies were infeft therein conform to instrument of sasine recorded in the General Register of Sasines at Edinburgh, 4th December 1851; but the particulars of that deed I am not enabled to state.

1926. Chairman.] You state that a part of the property which you have been just describing, has been sold to these persons?—Yes; and they are entered as the proprietors of it.

1927. That does not apply to the remainder of the property?—No; they did not sell the whole; that piece of property is now entered as belonging to Mrs. Robinson, in trust for the community of the "Good Shepherd, per Thomas Stout," and the occupier is stated as Mrs. Robinson, the rental being stated at 105 l.; then there is another piece of property entered in the same way.

1928. Mr. Matthews.] Is Mrs. Robinson one of the persons to whom this is conveyed?—Her name does not occur in the reference I have to the deed under which the property was conveyed.

1929. Mr. Newdegate.] You have now spoken of a property which has been separated from the principal property?—Yes.

1930. And you are now describing that separate property?—Yes; the property is entered in two sections, and one is called a house and the other a reformatory for girls. In the valuation roll the house is entered as of the value of 105 l., and the reformatory is entered as of the value of 60 l.

1931. Chairman.] Did either of these properties pass under the deed which you referred to just now?—Both these properties.

1932. Mr. Matthews.] The real owners appear from the deed actually registered, and Mr. Robinson is probably the manager?—The valuator very generally, indeed I think always, takes the name that is given to him, but Mrs. Robinson may be legally vested in the property under the operation of the deed. But into that the assessor will not care to inquire; he does not make any inquiry as to the title of anyone who returns himself as being the proprietor.

1933. Mr. Newdegate.] Now, as regards the principal property from which this was separated, have you any record of the value of that?—Yes; I take that to be the property now described as belonging to the "Reverend Anselm Robertson;" but I have some uncertainty about that, and I would not wish to state that that is the same property; I rather think that it is; that the property entered in the valuation roll as belonging to the Reverend Anselm Robertson, and occupied as a reformatory for boys, is part of the original property conveyed under the first deed which I read. I suppose it is the part which remains after the part given off to the ladies of the community of the Good Shepherd.

1934. Now, my question relates to the principal original property from which this was separated; can you speak as to that?—If I am right in the view which I have mentioned, then the value of what remains is stated under three heads, first, "house and ground," of the annual value of 120 l.; "pasture land," of the annual value of 50 l.; and a "house," of the value of 12 l.

1935. Have you anything further to state with respect to property originally vested for the benefit of eight nuns of the convent of the Good Shepherd?—I think not; I think that is all that I can state with regard to that.

1936. Now, I will go to another property; can you produce an extract of title, and an extract from the valuation roll relating to some property belonging to the Little Sisters of the Poor?—There is no title that I have found that specially refers to the Little Sisters of the Poor; but from the Catholic Directory it would appear that these ladies are located upon the subjects acquired by the Sisters of Mercy in Garngad-hill.

1937. Will you read the extract?—That relating to property at 138, Garngad-hill, is one of the titles I have already put in.

1938. That is part of the property referred to in your previous evidence, is it?—It is.

1939. Can you give the value of this property, and its extent?—I have also stated that already.

1940. Have you any further evidence to give with respect to this property occupied or enjoyed by the Little Sisters of the Poor?—No, I have not.

1941. Now, have you any further evidence to give with respect to the Roman Catholic properties?—I find that in Abercrombie-street there is a property occupied as an "Orphanage and Female Industrial School," stated to belong to "Dr. Gray and others, per Rev. Patrick Forbes," and occupied by "Madame Suffum, superior," the value of which is stated at 120 l.

1942. That is an extract from the valuation roll?—Yes; there is a house adjoining, also occupied by the same lady, "for self and sisters," of the value of 10 l. Then there is adjoining an industrial school for boys.

1943. Mr. Matthews.] Who occupies that?—The tenant is stated to be the "Roman Catholic school manager, per John Orr, superintendent," the same proprietor, Dr. Gray and others, the value of which is stated to be 250 l.; and there are other properties there, a house and a day-school, stated respectively to be of the value of 60 l. and 30 l. I have the deed for that, and can produce it if it is desired.

1944. That is all the evidence that you have to give with respect to these Roman Catholic institutions?—It is so.

1945. Chairman.] You say that this is no evidence at all as to who this property is owned by?—I do not exactly put it so; for many purposes this will be received as evidence on behalf of the party representing himself as in right of the property. For instance, for a party claiming to be put on the roll of electors, this is quite sufficient.

1946. All you know is the occupant, the person who returns you his name and the value of the property?—Yes, excepting as far as the deeds disclose, who are the persons in whom the property is vested.

1947. You are satisfied with the name of the occupant?—I have given you both, as they appear on the roll.

1948. You are satisfied with the name of the occupants, though there is nothing in the deed to indicate that they are the occupiers?—Excepting where the same name occurs. If I find the names in the deed occurring in the entry of the he subjects to which it applies in the valuation oll, of course I presume that the same person s referred to.

1949. You mentioned, did you not, a case where you did not find the same name as the occupier?—I think you will very seldom find hat the entries in the valuation roll quite correpond with the entries in the deed.

1950. There is no necessary connection between them?—I am not prepared to say that.

1951. In the Scotch courts they would take ntry in the valuation roll as primary evidence f possession, would they not?—Yes.

1952. Mr. Newdegate.] You have produced undry trust-deeds; there is a difference in those rust-deeds, is there not, from the model deeds f the Free Church schools, from those of the United Presbyterian schools, and from those of he Reformed Presbyterian body; and will you state what that difference is?—The model deeds f the churches that you have named generally place the right of property with the congregation, and make the property to follow the distinctive principles of the body, but are so framed as to exclude all questions as to these principles from the law courts. So far as I have been able to form an opinion upon the deeds which I have produced applicable to the Roman Catholic Church, they rather seem to indicate that the property will follow the authorities of the Church.

1953. Will you give the Committee a copy of the Free Church deed, the United Presbyterian deed, and the Reform Presbyterian deed?—Yes, I will produce copies. I wish to explain that the model deeds do not apply to church school property in particular, but to ecclesiastical property generally. I wish also to state, with regard to the Reformed Presbyterian Church, that that Church has no model deed; but I can put in a title to part of their property which is very generally used for that body.

THE RIGHT HON. CHARLES PELHAM VILLIERS, IN THE CHAIR.

MR. JAMES DEWAR, recalled; and further Examined.

Mr. J. Dewar. 24 June 1870.

1954. Mr. Newdegate.] WHEN you were last before this Committee, you referred to the copy of a certain sermon, which you had not heard, but which appeared in the newspapers, and the Committee very properly required that that should be verified. I understand that that sermon contains a detailed account of this institution of the Redemptionists, and I beg to ask you whether you can produce evidence that the report which you held in your hand at that time is correct?—I have a copy of the paper verified by the reporter.

1955. Will you produce the verification of the reporter?—I have a letter from the reporter stating that it is correct.

1956. Will you read it?—"It is not the practice to do what you request, except before a court" (I asked for an affidavit before a justice). "I can however swear to the accuracy of my report of Dr. Smith's sermon, and, if necessary, am quite willing to appear before the Committee for that purpose. With this I send a paper containing the sermon, over which I have written my name, certifying that it is correct; will that be sufficient? Yours truly, James S. Stewart." That is dated 22nd June 1870, and the certification on the paper is, "I certify that this sermon is correctly reported, James S. Stewart."

1957. Chairman.] You addressed the reporter yourself?—I addressed the reporter myself, and I got a telegram the last day that I was here after the Committee rose, stating the same thing, namely, that the report was correct. "I condensed Dr. Smith's speech from my notes; I omitted passages, but what appeared was word for word as spoken."

1959. I will read one passage from a report of that sermon, and ask you whether it is consistent with what you hold in your hand: "The headlong fury of the mob, whom the very men who inspired them characterised as 'the rascal multitude,' drove them to the religious houses of the Grey and Black Friars; and in a few hours those magnificent edifices were destroyed with their riches, their altars, their confessionals, and every hallowed relic of antiquity. The same fate was experienced by the charterhouse of the Carthusian Monastery; and that day's work was the prelude to many similar excesses perpetrated at Scone, Cupar, Dundee, St. Andrew's, and other places. How consoling it is at last, after 300 years, to find us assembled peacefully to-day in the township where these scenes of iconoclastic vandalism were perpetrated, to open such a church as this, built by the genius of a distinguished local architect, with the friendly co-operation and the best wishes of the citizens of the town which, 300 years ago, disowned so strongly the worship of the Catholic Church;" does that appear in the report which you have?—That appears in the report.

1960. Now with reference to the Ursulines of Jesus, St. Margaret's, Edinburgh, can you produce a certified entry from the valuation roll of the burgh of Edinburgh showing proprietor, occupier, and rental?—Yes; "St. Margaret's Convent, Whitehouse, Loan; proprietor, Margaret Clapperton and others, per Macdonald and Roger, 8a, Abercromby-place; occupier, Margaret Clapperton and others; rental, 380*l.*"

1961. That is a correct entry?—An attested extract by the town clerk of Edinburgh from the roll.

1962. Now I will go to the Sisters of Mercy, St. Catherine's, Edinburgh; can you produce a certified entry of that from the valuation roll of the burgh of Edinburgh?—I can. The entry is, "St. Catherine's Convent; situation, Lauriston-place; proprietor, Mrs. Colonel Hutchinson's trustees, per Lindsay Howe and Company" (the agents for the trustees), "32, Charlotte-square; occupier, Sisters of Mercy; rental, 340*l.*"

1963. Then I go to the establishment of the Jesuits in Edinburgh; can you produce a certified extract of the valuation roll of a church and house of the society of Jesuits, Edinburgh?—I can; the description of the property, in the first place, is, "Church situated in Lauriston-street; proprietor, Society of Jesuits, per the Rev. H. Walmesley there; annual rent, 400*l.*"

1964. Is that a correct entry?—That is an attested entry; there is also a house in connection with this society, a house situated in Lauriston-place, owned by the "Roman Catholic Society, per Macdonald and Roger, 8, Abercrombie-place; rent, 30*l.*"

1965. I will now take the property of the Loretto Nuns, in Leith; can you produce a certified ified extract of entries from the valuation roll of he burgh of Leith, of properties held by the Roman Catholic Church, and can you state, on the uthority of the assessor, that the second entry f this extract is the house occupied by the nuns, he proprietors of which are said to be the trustees f the Roman Catholic Church?—I can.

1966. Will you read, in the first instance, the irst extract that you have made?—The first extract refers to a dwelling-house, occupied by the Rev. Edward Bradshaw, but the second one efers to the house you are asking for, namely, umber 106 on the roll, situated in Constitution-treet; "proprietor, the trustees of the Roman Catholic Church; occupier, Roman Catholic Church trustees aforesaid; annual value, 45 l."

1967. Mr. Matthews.] Do you know that the ouse is occupied by the nuns?—I am speaking f the house as it is assessed by the burgh ssessor.

1968. The burgh assessor says nothing about he nuns?—I daresay not, because it is not sual to enter those particulars.

1969. This is all that he attests, "proprietor, he trustees of the Roman Catholic Church," and he occupiers the same?—I can only speak to hat entry upon the authority of the assessor, ecause I am not familiar with the house or its nmates.

1970. Mr. Newdegate.] Take the extract in our hand and read it through, and then I will sk where you got it from?—There are four roperties in this return; the second one is described in the roll as "a dwelling-house situated n Constitution-street; proprietor, the trustees of he Roman Catholic Church," and the occupier s set down in the roll, "Roman Catholic Church rustees aforesaid; rental, 45 l." The owner, School-room, Kirk-gate; proprietor, the same, he trustees of the Roman Catholic Church," and he occupier the same; rental, 25 l. Then comes Chapel, Constitution-street; proprietors, "trustees of the Roman Catholic Church," and occupier he same; rental, 120 l. And upon the authority f the assessor, I am able to say that this second ntry is occupied by nuns.

1971. Will you read the attestation?—"Certified, James Simpson, Assessor of Lands and Heritages."

1972. Mr. Matthews.] I see nothing about Loretto Nuns in that?—That is only obtained from ocal knowledge.

1973. Mr. Newdegate.] Do you know anything about this property yourself?—Not personally.

1974. Is this person the assessor who has sent ou that paper?—He is the assessor.

1975. Then that information is from the assessor?—It is from the assessor, but the fact of uns occupying it does not appear in the roll.

1976. Mr. Jessel.] How do you know that act?—From the assessor personally, privately.

1977. Mr. Matthews.] You had conversation with him?—I had communication.

1978. Did he write a letter?—Yes.

1979. What is the letter?—"Agreeably to equest, left here this afternoon by Mr. Armand sking extract from valuation roll relating to ouse in Leith occupied by persons known as Loretto Nuns, I enclose certified extract of roperty belonging to the Roman Catholic Church trustees in their own occupancy. The second entry is the house occupied by the Sisters of Charity.—I am, yours truly, James Simpson."

1980. Chairman.] You know that to come from the assessor?—I do.

1981. Mr. Matthews.] Was it addressed to you?—It was not addressed to me.

1982. To whom was it addressed?—I do not know that I am at liberty to say that.

1983. Are you unwilling to say?—I would rather not, unless you require it.

1984. Chairman.] You know that it came from the assessor?—I know that it came from him.

1985. Mr. Newdegate.] Inasmuch as you have been an assessor yourself for some time, can you describe how the valuation roll in Scotland is made up?—It is made up under the Act which I hold in my hand, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 91, 10th August 1854; and the process by which we make up the roll is to issue schedules in accordance with the schedule in the Act, calling upon all proprietors to fill up the particulars stated there, and also calling upon all occupiers to fill up those particulars. The assessor's right to call for that is contained in the 7th clause of the Act.

1986. Will you read that clause?—"It shall be lawful for any assessor acting under this Act to call upon any person being a proprietor or reputed proprietor, or tenant or occupier, within the county or burgh or district for which such assessor is appointed, for a written statement of the yearly rent or value, and of all other particulars required by this Act of all lands and heritages within such county or burgh or district of which such person is proprietor or reputed proprietor, or tenant or occupier; and if any such person shall, without reasonable excuse, fail to furnish such written statement to such assessor within 14 days after he shall be called upon in writing so to do, he shall be liable to pay a penalty not exceeding 20 l.; and if any such person shall present, or cause to be presented, to such assessor any false statement of such yearly rent or value, or other particulars as aforesaid, he knowing the same to be false, he shall be liable to pay a penalty of 50 l." The practice in Perth has been to call for schedules from both proprietor and occupier. In some places only proprietors are called upon, and the tenants are surveyed with a view of checking the proprietors' schedule. The practice in Perth up to the present year has been to call on both parties to make returns, and they have always done so.

1987. Chairman.] Does not the law prescribe the mode in which they shall return the value of the property?—It does; it is in the schedule of the Act.

1988. Mr. Newdegate.] Have you anything further to state?—I am not aware that I have.

1989. Mr. Matthews.] Only one passage of this sermon, to which reference has been made, has been read to you; it appears from this sermon, does it not, that these gentlemen, the Redemptonists, are engaged in missionary work?—Yes, it does.

1990. Let me read you this passage: "It is not intended by any means that the work of the missionaries shall supersede the ministrations of the clergy who may be appointed to particular districts; on the contrary, it is to help them in the very way their hearts will most desire. And, therefore, it is a rule among the fathers who go to missions, to do nothing except in concert with the authorities whom the bishops have appointed to be the ordinary administrators of the places to which they may be called. Already many times the cities in Scotland, and even in England, have experienced the beneficial effects of their ministrations"?—I believe that is quite correct; they supplement the work of the resident clergy. I do not think that they supersede it.

1991. And they supplement it in particular by giving retreats, or periods of prayer, and meditation, and preaching, and so on, in the district?—They hold what, I understand, are called missions in different towns.

1992. Those missions are satisfactory, at any rate, to their co-religionists, as far as you know?—They must be.

1993. Those gentlemen have been welcomed there not only by the clergy, but also by the laity among the Roman Catholics?—I have no doubt they have. I cannot say that they have received any welcome beyond their own community.

1994. You have given evidence about certain establishments at Edinburgh; do you know anything of the nature of any one of those establishments?—Not personally.

1995. Do you know whether they are devoted to the education of the poor?—I am not able to answer that question.

1996. You know nothing about them?—Except the extracts that I got from the assessor, and the private information which he communicated. In the making up of the valuation roll, we do not inquire particularly into those questions.

1997. The chief point in the valuation roll I take it, is the rent?—The rent.

1998. You have no personal remedy against either occupier or proprietor, have you?—In regard to the taxes, I suppose they have.

1999. They cannot go against the occupier personally?—I believe they can.

2000. I thought it was only by distress?—The rates are recovered in the usual way by the sheriff's officers.

2001. You do not bring an action against anybody; nobody is personally liable, is he?—I am not personally aware.

2002. Chairman.] How long has this institution that you have been referring to in Perth been established?—The house in Kinnoull Hill has been established, I should think, about two years.

2003. That is at some distance from the place where the Catholics dwell, is it not?—It is about half an hour's walk up hill.

2004. You know nothing about how far they aid or supplement the labours of the clergy; you have only heard it stated?—I have only heard it stated.

2005. You have never met them?—I am not aware that they do any extra work, so far as I know in Perth.

2006. Mr. Matthews.] Do you know anything about the St. Joseph's Convent, in Stormont-street, Perth?—I know there is such an institution.

2007. Do you know what work those ladies do?—I believe that one half of them give themselves up to teaching in the penitentiary and religious exercises there.

2008. Is the penitentiary an establishment for fallen women?—No; it is the general prison for Scotland, and others of them teach in their own schools in the High-street.

2009. Then, in fact, they are all employed in some charitable work of that sort?—I believe they are.

Mr. John Macmillan Robertson, recalled; and further Examined.

Mr. Robertson.

2010. Mr. Newdegate.] I believe that you have something to add to the evidence given on the last day; may I ask whether you can produce a map of the City of Glasgow, showing the position of the friary in that city?—Yes; I produce a map of the City of Glasgow, as published with the Glasgow Post Office Directory in the month of May last (producing the same).

2011. Where is this Franciscan Friary situated? It is situated on the south side of the city; the eastern part of it, in Cumberland-street, Glasgow. It is marked, "R. C. Friary;" I was unable, at the last meeting, to give the excerpt from the title to this property, but I said that I expected to be able to produce it to-day, and I am now in a position to do so.

2012. Will you produce the extract from the title-deeds to which you referred?—"The site on which the property is built stands vested in the most Rev. Charles Eyre, Archbishop of the Roman Catholic Church in Scotland, the Right Rev. John Gray, Bishop of the Roman Catholic Church in the western district of Scotland, and the Very Rev. Livin Anthony Emmanuel Kenners, parish priest of St. Francis, Roman Catholic parish, Glasgow, as trustees for behoof of the Roman Catholic congregation of St. Francis, Glasgow;" and the ground extends to about two acres.

2013. Have you given the value in your previous evidence?—No, I have not, but I will give it now.

2014. Mr. Jessel.] There is no other trust declared of that?—No other trust. The buildings erected upon that property are entered as follows in the valuation roll for the burgh of Glasgow: "School, Cumberland-street, proprietor, St. Francis Friary, per Rev. Emmanuel Kenners; South Cumberland-street, occupier, St. Francis Friary, per Emanuel Kenners; annual value, 40 l., but reduced on appeal to 30 l." The friary is entered separately as belonging to the same proprietor, and in the same occupation, and of the annual value of 100 l.

2015. Is it called "friary"?—It is; the "friary" is entered in the same names as the schools.

2016. Chairman.] What is the Rev. Emmanuel Kenners?—He is both proprietor and occupier.

2017. That is to say, as far as his own return proves it?—And the title-deed also shows that; the title-deed and the return are in this case identical.

2018. Did the title-deeds refer to him as the proprietor?—Yes, and to some other trustees.

2019. And he is elected to make the return?—He is.

2020. He would be looked to for payment of the rates?—Yes.

2021. And supposing there were arrears due, upon whom would the process be served?—The Rev. Mr. Kenners would in that case be personally liable if the authorities chose to recover by action.

action. They can recover either by action or by distress; we have a double remedy in Scotland.

2022. You would distrain upon the property itself?—Yes.

2023. But you would not look to any other person, though you had evidence that there were other trustees, but the person who made the return?—I am not prepared to say that they would not be liable if it could be shown they were really proprietors.

2024. But you are usually satisfied with the return made by the person himself that he is the owner?—If a person returns himself as owner and nothing is known to the contrary, he is set down as proprietor; in this case he did not claim proprietorship as a personal right, but as a trust right.

2025. The law requires every occupant to make a return of his property, and with that return he gives his name?—Yes.

2026. Was he, Mr. Kenners, distinguished from any other proprietor in the way in which he made that return?—Only in this respect, that he made the return in such a way as to show that it is not a personal right, but a trust right; he is only set down here as a trustee, or rather as the hand which makes the return to the assessor.

2027. But in law you do not recognise anybody as trustee, but you look upon him as the occupier of the property, and therefore liable?—Yes.

2028. Mr. Matthews.] You assume that he is the same Rev. Emmanuel Kenners as is mentioned in the deed to which you have referred?—Yes.

2029. And he is there described as the "Parish priest of St. Francis?"—Yes.

2030. Chairman.] Are you the registrar of deeds?—No. I am speaking of what I know from my practice as a solicitor.

2031. But do the parochial authorities ever look to the title of the property entered?—Not in the usual case. If it happened that there were any special difficulties in recovering the rates, I have no doubt the parochial authorities, if they thought it necessary, would find means of looking at the title, so as to get at the real proprietors.

2032. What is the purpose of anybody returning himself as trustee; is it to indicate to the parish that he is not the real owner?—It would be scarcely proper for him to return himself as proprietor if he were only holding in trust.

2033. You say that if there were arrears of rates, the parish would go against him alone, though he is described as trustee?—He could be gone against alone in consequence of his having made this return.

2034. And it would be no answer to the proceedings to say that he was a trustee?—I think not.

2035. Mr. Matthews.] There is no action, is there, for recovery of rates?—I act as agent for a parish, and I know that we have chosen in several instances to proceed by action rather than the other remedy. We have a very cheap form of recovery in the small debts court; and it is sometimes better to try questions as to rates in that way rather than proceed by distress.

2036. Mr. Bourke.] You recover it before the sheriff?—Yes.

2037. Mr. Newdegate.] Have you anything to add to your evidence with respect to the manner of making up the valuation roll in Scotland?—Before you proceed to that, would you allow me to mention that there is another entry in the valuation roll applicable to this property; it is that of the chapel, which is set down as of the value of 150 l. The entries for this property are 40 l. for the school, 100 l. for the friary, and 150 l. for the chapel, and all are entered as belonging to the same proprietor, and in the same tenancy.

2038. Now will you state how the valuation rolls in Scotland are made up?—They are made up in the manner described by Mr. Dewar.

2039. You have heard the evidence?—I heard that evidence.

2040. And do you agree with it?—I agree with what Mr. Dewar stated.

2041. Will you state, shortly, the difference between the Romish trusts and the trusts of the other religious bodies, as appearing from the deeds produced by yourself to the Committee, and also the effect of that distinction in regard to the members of these several religious denominations?—I think I answered that question at the last meeting.

2042. Will you now produce, in support of that evidence, the deed of the property belonging to the friary of St. Francis, and also the deed with regard to the Dalbeth and Westhorn property?—I have already produced an excerpt from the St. Francis title, showing the form in which it is held; and the copies referring to Dalbeth which you refer to, I expected to have had here to-day, but I have just had a communication to the effect that after being copied, the train in which they were sent away sustained an accident, and the consequence is that the copies have not yet arrived; but if the Committee will allow me an opportunity, I can put them in afterwards.

2043. Will you state generally the difference between these deeds, and put in the papers which are delayed by the accident of the train when they come?—I stated on the last occasion that almost every case which has been yet decided in the Scotch courts, with reference to ecclesiastical property, has been decided upon the principle that the property is attached to the holding of certain doctrines or principles; but that the reading which I have made of these Roman Catholic trusts, leads me to be of opinion that the property held under them would follow, not doctrine or principle, but external authority; that is the opinion I have formed, stated generally.

2044. You will furnish the Committee with the extracts from the deeds which illustrate that opinion?—Those extracts which I have already furnished illustrate that opinion; I made reference, at the last meeting, to certain model deeds which have now been adopted by the Free Church, the United Presbyterian Church, and the Reformed Presbyterian Church; these are designed so to regulate the disposal of ecclesiastical property, that if any question arose with regard to it, the question should be determined, not by a court of law deciding upon what are principles of the church, but by the members of the church themselves, either by the members in a particular congregation, or by a vote in the ecclesiastical courts; that is the object of those model deeds to which I referred.

2045. Chairman.] What does "a vote in the ecclesiastical courts" mean?—What I mean by that is this, that in the event of any question arising in the church which might be supposed to effect its principles, the decision of the highest ecclesiatical court of the church should be binding over the whole body, and that the property should follow that decision.

2046. Mr. Jessel.] You mean by a court, an assembly of the church?—Yes; I am speaking of ecclesiastical courts, courts that have no jurisdiction, except by consent.

2047. Mr. Matthews.] Just the same jurisdiction as Roman Catholic bishops?—Just the same in respect to consent.

2049. Mr. Newdegate.] You intended by your answer that, in the case of the Presbyterian body, these properties were subject to the jurisdiction of the court, that they were to be held subject to the decision of the majority of the synod of those bodies?—Or of the General Assembly, as the case may be, these courts being composed one-half of clergymen and the other half of laymen.

2050. Then, if I understand you rightly, the Roman Catholic property, and the property of the Free Church of Scotland, the United Presbyterians, and other bodies, is held by law upon the same terms, that is, as common property by contract among the members of the several denominations?—No doubt the court would look at the case of Roman Catholic property as a question of contract, and would construe that contract according to the evidence in regard to it; but what I stated was this, that it appears from the nature of these trusts that the principle involved in them is subjection to a certain external authority, that authority being the clergy.

2051. Then the difference which you wish to express to the Committee, as appearing to you from examination and comparison of the deeds on which these several bodies hold their property, is, that it is not the majority of any assembly within Scotland or England that disposes of the Roman Catholic property, but it is some authority external to the United Kingdom. The question is, what do you mean by the term "external?"—The sense in which I used it was, external to the congregation. The Roman Catholic trusts which I have read to the Committee indicate, first of all, the bishop, as the higher authority to the trustees, but of course he derives his authority from and in the execution of the duties of his office, and is subject to the control which I suppose exists out of the United Kingdom. The difference between the two may be expressed in this way, that with the Presbyterians the right to the property is disposed of by the people, because both the ministers and the elders who sit in their ecclesiastical courts are chosen by the people; with the others the right to disposal is with the bishops or their superiors again, who are not chosen by the people. I suppose the organisation of the Roman Catholic Church requires that every one should be subject to his superior.

2052. The substance of your answer I conceive to be this, that, according to your reading of the deeds under which the properties of these several bodies are held, whereas, in the case of the Presbyterian bodies to which you have referred, the majority of their assembly is the disposing body; in the case of the Roman Catholic property, it is some other authority than the majority of any assembly?—The disposing body in the Presbyterian Church may either be the General Assembly, or the majority in the congregation itself; you get it taken both ways in these model deeds; but with reference to the Roman Catholic Church it certainly does appear that the disposing authority is an authority external to the congregation.

2053. Will you produce the deeds?—Yes (producing them).

2054. Mr. Bourke.] You spoke about the Roman Catholic and Presbyterian bodies; with regard to other Episcopalian bodies than the Roman Catholics, do you know their rule with regard to property; because there are Episcopalian bodies in Scotland besides the Roman Catholics that you have not mentioned?—I do not think that they have any special model deed.

2055. When you used the words, "external authority," with regard to Roman Catholics, would they apply to the other Episcopalian Church as well as the Roman Catholic Church?—I have not sufficient information to enable me to answer that question with reference to the Episcopal Church.

2057. Mr. Pease.] You have in Scotland Wesleyan Methodists?—We have.

2058. Have you seen their model deeds for holding property for schools and chapels?—No, I have not seen any model deed of the Wesleyan body.

2059. Have you seen any of their deeds?—No.

2060. You cannot say how far they are subject to conference?—No.

2062. Do you know whether there is any corresponding authority in Scotland to the Charity Commissioners in England?—I think not.

2064. If there is any irregularity, it must come before the courts, as in any other case?—Yes; it would depend upon the parties interested to bring it before the courts.

2065. But are deeds registered there, supposing them to be Catholic deeds, involving charitable trusts?—Yes, and we have had many actions in the courts for the purpose of enforcing the due administration of charities.

2067. But all deeds purporting to be for charities are registered in Scotland; any person may see them, and if there is any misapplication of the trust, any person interested may proceed and bring the case before the courts?—I believe, in practice, every deed constituting a trust is registered; and every person having interest is entitled to bring it before the court to see to the due administration.

2068. Do you know any deeds that are registered having Catholic objects in view?—What I have given you are deeds of that nature.

2069. Those deeds that you have referred to do do not avow the purpose for which the property has been assigned?—Some of them do; others do not. The first deed that I quoted, the deed with reference to Smyllam Park, makes special reference to the purposes.

2070. Those trusts are not considered illegal in Scotland, are they?—I have not seen anything in any of those trusts that I am prepared to say is illegal.

2071. There is no objection to registering them?—No; the registrar takes in every deed, and records it without regard to its contents.

2072. You never heard of one being disputed on account of the purpose for which it was created?—No.

2073. The laws of mortmain apply in Scotland, I suppose, as they do in England?—No.

2074. What have you to correspond to that; you do not allow land to be held in perpetuity, do you, in Scotland?—I do not know anything to the contrary.

2075. Land can be left to be held in trust for a religious purpose for ever in Scotland?—Yes.

2077. Then the differences that you wish to point out between their trust-deeds and those of certain Presbyterian bodies that you have enumerated, are not differences in law, but differences in the terms of the contract, as I understand from you, which their trusts create from those trusts voluntarily created by Presbyterian deeds?—That is so, arising both from the terms of the deeds themselves, and, from what I understand to be the fact, that Roman Catholic congregations do not exercise any power of direction and control over the ecclesiastical property of the Church.

2078. Is that statement of yours derived from any knowledge you have got on the subject, or from an impression on your part?—Well, it appears very clearly in some of the deeds.

2079. I refer to the latter part of your answer. You have mentioned two things, first, the difference in the deeds, and then you went on to state something which is your impression as to the Roman Catholic practice. I want to know how far that is knowledge, or whether it is merely opinion?—It is part of the general impression that I have that the organisation of the Roman Catholic church places the control of the property with the ecclesiastics.

2080. But you are not prepared to state your authority for that statement; it is only your impression?—It is my impression, and I have seen nothing in any of these deeds to the contrary; I know of nothing to the contrary.

2081. You said that in the Presbyterian deeds which you have quoted, in case of any dispute arising regarding the trust, it would be determined by the decision of the highest voluntary ecclesiastical court of that denomination of Presbyterians, did you not?—I rather think that you misunderstood me a little in regard to that. What I meant to say was, that the property would follow the decision of the Supreme Court. The court itself would not sit as a court to dispose of the question of property.

2082. I understand that the deed creates a contract to abide by the decision of that voluntary ecclesiastical court?—The highest ecclesiastical court having given its judgment upon any matter connected with the Church, if a minority dissented from that and left the Church, the property would remain with those who adhered to the decision of the Ecclesiastical Court. But that, of course, would not be delivered with regard to a question of property, but merely with reference to the particular subject that was under discussion.

2083. Now, leaving out your impression as to the different constitution of voluntary ecclesiastical authorities in the Roman Catholic Church and in the different Presbyterian Churches, is there anything in the Roman Catholic trust-deeds which you have mentioned to show that a decision on such a case would not be left to the analogous body, that is, to the highest voluntary ecclesiastical court of the Roman Catholic Church, whatever that may be?—The deeds, of which I have produced excerpts, in which special reference is made to that matter, seem to put it solely with the bishop.

2085. Then assuming (which I do not admit) that your statement of the management and government of the Roman Catholic Church and of the Presbyterians is correct, does not the difference simply amount to this, that in the case of a dispute arising in the Presbyterian body, it would be decided by what is their highest voluntary ecclesiastical authority, which is, as I gather from you, substantially a majority; and in the case of the Roman Catholic body, by what is their highest voluntary ecclesiastical authority, which happens not to be the majority of the congregation?—The difference which I wished to express was this, that in the one particular case, in the case of the Presbyterians, the decision that would attach to the property will be either that of the majority of the General Assembly or synod, or the majority of the congregation, as the deed itself may have provided; that is, under the model deeds, I should say; because, under the trusts in their previous forms, the courts have held that principle was the determining point, and that any departure, however slight, from principle involved a loss of the property even to the majority; that a minority, no matter how small, could vindicate its rights as against the majority, if there was the slightest divergence from the principles of the body.

2086. Mr. Jessel.] That is to say, the courts of law in Scotland enforce the trusts on which the property was held?—Yes; that would equally apply to all deeds which had not a special provision, providing some other mode for settling disputes. In the Free Church model deed, and also in the Reformed Presbyterian deed, there is provision made for the case where a minority of a certain amount shall declare that they held the principles more clearly than the majority; majority; this provision in the Free Church deed is in these terms: "It is hereby specially provided and declared, that if, at any time hereafter, one-third of the whole ordained ministers, having the charge of congregations of the said body, or united body of Christians, or any larger number of the said ordained ministers, having charges as aforesaid, shall simultaneously, or within a consecutive period not exceeding three calendar months, not only publicly separate from the said body or united body of Christians, but at the same time publicly claim and profess to hold, truly and in bonâ fide, the principles of the protest of 18th May 1843, hereinbefore recited, and to be carrying out the objects of the said protest more faithfully than the majority of the ministers of the said body, or united body of Christians, and shall unite in forming one body of Christians, having kirk sessions presbyteries, provincial synods, and a general assembly, then, and in that case, and anything herein to the contrary notwithstanding, it shall be competent to, and in the power of a majority of the congregation, in the use, occupation, and enjoyment of the said building or place of worship for the time, to provide and declare, by a deed of declaration and appointment under their hands, to that effect duly executed, that the ground hereby disposed, and building or place of worship then upon the same, shall, from thenceforward, be held as in connection with the body of Christians adhering to the ministers who shall have separated as aforesaid;" that exception shows the rule that I have been referring to.

2087. Mr. O'Reilly.] Mr. Newdegate asked you whether these trusts were not subject to the decision of an authority external to the United Kingdom; am I right in understanding that you did not consider that they were subject to the decision of an authority external to the United Kingdom?—My answer is, that the bishop seems to be the controlling power in those cases; and if the bishop is subject to some other authority, that authority may be out of the United Kingdom for anything that I know.

2089. You have given us a great deal of information with regard to institutions at Lanark and in Glasgow as to their valuation; first, you mentioned the Vincentian Fathers and the Sisters of Charity; what is that institution at Smyllum-park? — Smyllum-park is stated to be an orphanage.

2090. Do you know how many orphans are kept there?—I know nothing in regard to it, except what is stated in the Catholic Directory, and in the report which I quoted.

2091. Will you tell me how many orphans there are from similar authority?—In the Directory I do not see it stated what number of orphans they have, but they state that they have accommodation for 250 orphans; the number actually there, I do not know.

2094. They have also got a hospital, I think you mentioned, of which you gave us the valua tion?—The hospital stands upon a separate pro perty from the orphanage.

2095. Do you know how many beds for the sick that hospital contains?—I do not.

2096. Will you look to page 132 of the book that you quoted from, namely, the Scotch Direc tory?—At page 132 I find it stated that the hos pital contains 20 beds.

2097. Then the next thing, I think, which you mentioned is property which you stated belong to Jesuits in Glasgow?—Yes.

2098. There is a school there on part of it; school of the value of 150*l.* a year?—Yes.

2099. Do you know anything of that; it i really a school, I suppose?—Yes.

2100. You do not know how many boys ar taught there?—I do not.

2101. From your knowledge of Glasgow you would not be surprised, probably, if you hear that, including externs, 500 or 600 boys ar educated there?—I would be rather surprised but I have no means of forming an opinion.

2102. Then there is a chapel which is value at 80*l.* a year?—Yes.

2103. That, I suppose, is for public worship —I presume so.

2104. The Chairman asked you whether Ca tholic trusts were legal in Scotland; and, I think you said that they were, for Catholic cha ritable purposes?—I know of no rule, in regar to Catholic trusts different from the trusts of an other religious denomination; of course, whethe they are legal or not, would depend upon thei nature.

2105. You think that there is no special law i Scotland against them; is there no law in Scot land, then, against religious men, or men boun by vows; you know that the Emancipation Ac does, in fact, extend to the United Kingdom?— Yes; I know of no difference between the law of Scotland and England on the subject; what ever applies to one applies to the other; there i no special Scotch law.

2106. But the law against religious men boun by vows does extend to Scotland, I presume; th Emancipation Act, I mean?—Well, I under stand so.

2107. And it would therefore make any trus for their use illegal, would it not, in Scotland just as much as in England?—It would. If yo assume that monasteries are illegal, a trust fo that purpose would of course be illegal.

2108. Does the Statute of Superstitious Use extend to Scotland?—I am not prepared t answer the question; I have not had my atten tion directed to that.

2109. Have you any law in Scotland analogou to the Statute of Superstitious Uses in England —I should think so, but I am not in a position t quote it at this moment.

2110. Chairman.] You never heard of any cas arising on that matter in Scotland?—I cannc charge my memory at this moment.

2111. You know of no trust declared void o account of the purpose being stated in the deed —I ar

—I am not prepared to state a case at this moment.

2112. Mr. Matthews.] You have told us about a great many institutions; were you solicitor to the Vincentian Fathers, or the Marist Fathers?—I was employed in the preparation of the title to the property in Cumberland-street, which is entered in the valuation roll as the Franciscan Friary.

2113. That is the only case in which you were personally concerned in registering the property?—The only case.

2114. Have you had any communication with the members of these institutions, so as to acquire any personal knowledge about their affairs?—None. The evidence that I have given is wholly confined to what appears upon the public registers.

2115. Is anybody in Scotland entitled to go and procure these copies that you have been good enough to bring here, on paying the necessary fee?—Any one.

2116. Is any one entitled to get a copy of the valuation roll?—Any one.

2117. They are all public documents?—Yes.

2118. Have you searched these registers and valuation rolls, with a view to this inquiry?—I have.

2119. Were you instructed by anybody to do so?—I was; at least, I was asked to take the trouble to do so.

2120. Will you say who was your client?—I cannot say that it was a client. I was asked by a friend who takes a particular interest in these matters.

2121. Is there any objection to our knowing his name?—He is a gentleman in Glasgow; a personal friend of my own.

2122. I do not want to know any names, but I want to know whether the information has been obtained merely with a view to this inquiry, or for some other ulterior purpose?—Merely with a view to this inquiry.

2123. At the instance of some gentleman who takes an interest in the subject, and who is desirous to inform the Committee?—Yes.

2124. Then, may I ask when you began to get up the information?—Within the last 14 days; I cannot tell you precisely; a comparatively short time ago.

2125. Were you told what institution to look for in the registers and valuation rolls?—I was told of course that it was information desired by this Committee. I knew from the newspapers what this Committee was appointed for, and I directed my inquiries accordingly. I sent and bought a copy of the Catholic Directory, and then made inquiries.

2126. You went to the registers and the valuation rolls?—Yes.

2127. Any ingenious person might have done the same thing; you had no special knowledge?—No special knowledge.

2128. You had no knowledge about the dealings with the property beyond what appears in the register of deeds?—Nothing beyond what appears upon the register of deeds and the valuation roll; and also, I may say, from the Dean of Guild Court proceedings, a court having charge of all matters connected with the erection of property within the municipality of Glasgow.

2129. Because I observe that in almost every instance, the proprietor and occupier stated in the valuation roll are roughly stated, inaccurately stated?—I am not prepared to say so.

2130. For instance, what appears in the valution roll to be owned by "Franciscan Convent, per James Connelly," appears by the deeds to be vested in the Right Rev. Dr. John Murdoch, Roman Catholic bishop and vicar apostolic, the Right Rev. Dr. Smith, another Roman Catholic bishop, and a number of Roman Catholic clergymen; is that not so?—Yes; but I presume that the property will be occupied in terms of the trust under which these gentlemen hold the property.

2131. They are declared to hold "in trust for the educational purposes of the Roman Catholic congregation in connection with the Church of St. Andrew, Great Clyde-street, Glasgow; and in particular, they should so hold the said subjects for a schoolhouse or schoolhouses, either or both, or for any other purpose in connection with the educational purposes aforesaid"?—Yes.

2134. Do you regard these two vicars-apostolic and these clergymen as being the "Franciscan Convent" among them?—No.

2135. How do you interpret the words, "Franciscan Convent"?—I do not interpret the words, "Franciscan Convent"; but I presume that these gentlemen who are vested as trustees in this property, regard the use now being made of this convent by the Franciscans as sanctioned by the terms of the trust under which they hold it.

2136. Do you happen to know that at that convent there is a large school?—Yes.

2137. And that the gentlemen who among them are said to own the premises, including James Connelly, are the schoolmasters of the school; do you happen to know that?—I do not know anything specially in regard to that school.

2138. What is there inconsistent in the trust, with two bishops and a number of others as trustees for the educational purposes of the congregation, if you find James Connelly and others living and teaching there?—I do not say that there is anything inconsistent; you put it that there is an inconsistency.

2141. Mr. Jessel.] Suppose they turn the place into a tavern, do you mean to say that the Scotch courts would not interfere under those trusts?—The difficulty would be to find the person who had the interest, and the right to challenge; you will find powers of selling and of disposing of the property in these terms: "It should not be lawful to, nor in the powers of the said trustees, except with the consent and approbation of the said Right Reverend Doctor John Murdoch, or of the Roman Catholic bishop, or vicar apostolic for the time in the said Western district of Scotland, or other district or division within which the said congregation might for the time be situated, to sell or dispose the aforesaid subjects or any part thereof, or to burden or contract debt upon the same, but it should be lawful for the said trustees for the time, with such consent and approbation, to do any of the said acts, the price or prices or sums borrowed being to be applied or used by the said trustees for the time in such way and manner as the said Right Reverend Doctor John Murdoch, or the said Roman Catholic bishop or vicar apostolic for the time, might direct; but with which application or use, purchasers or lenders should have no concern."

2142. Mr. Matthews.] Surely that is only the mode of investment of the proceeds of a sale; they may be invested as the vicar apostolic may direct, but the trust would apply to the fund arising from the sale in like manner?—It does not seem to be limited to a mere form of investment; "being to be applied or used" (it is not "invested") "by the said trustees for the time in such way and manner as the said Right Reverend Doctor John Murdock, or the said Roman Catholic Bishop or vicar apostolic for the time might direct;" there is no limitation there.

2143. But do you find the slightest trace that that clause has been acted upon, and the property has been sold?—I know nothing but what is in the deeds.

2144. You produce that as the only deed which you have found relating to that property?—The only deed which I have found relating to that property.

2145. If there had been a sale under that power, you would find that sale?—Providing that the deed had been recorded.

2146. Take another example: take what you call, and what the valuation calls, property belonging to the Rev. Eugene Small, the tenant being stated to be the Marist Brothers. The deed of that, as found at Question 1899, shows that the trustees are again two bishops and three or four Roman Catholic clergymen, and they hold the property "in trust for the religious and educational purposes, either or both, of the Roman Catholic Congregation of St. Mungo's aforesaid; secondly, that the said trustees for the time, and the survivors and survivor of them, shall have full power and discretion in the use and management." There again, what is there on the deed to show that the Marist Brothers have the slightest interest in that property, except simply as schoolmasters in the school established upon it?—The second purpose of the trust there is, "that the said trustees for the time, and the survivors and survivor of them, shall have full power and discretion in the use and management of the said subjects for the purposes aforesaid, without control or interference by any individual or individuals whomsoever."

2147. Do you mean to cite that as showing that they might hand it over, or have handed it over, to the Marist Brothers?—In point of fact the Marist Brothers are in possession of the property, but I do not state that the Marist Brothers are the proprietors of it.

2148. Then from what you know, the Marist Brothers have not the slightest interest in that property beyond being there to teach?—My evidence is, that the valuation roll shows that the Marist Brothers are the tenants or occupiers of this place, not the proprietors.

2149. Are you aware that there is a large church mission, and that there are large poor schools in that very place, St. Mungo's?—Yes.

2150. In which schools the Marist Brothers teach?—Yes.

2151. But then you must have schoolmasters of some sort?—Yes.

2152. Would you assume that the schoolmasters were the proprietors, or had any right beyond permissive occupancy?—I did not state that the Marist Brothers were owners; I have no right to assume that the Marist Brothers have any right beyond what is disclosed by the valuation roll.

2153. You have 120,000 Irish in Glasgow, have you not?—A large number.

2154. And some provision of this sort is necessary for the mission work and the teaching? It is necessary that there should be some provision for the teaching; I do not know what you mean by mission work.

2155. The saying of mass, and for public worship?—That may be quite right.

2156. And these deeds are the titles under which the churches and chapels are held?—Some of them, and some apply to the monastic institutions.

2158. You say "used for that purpose;" do you know anything beyond this, that you found persons called "Franciscans, or Marists, or Jurists, or something of that kind, who are occupiers of houses used for educational purposes, and who are returned as occupiers; the deeds of trust showing that those houses are devoted to educational purposes?—Yes; I found more than that; I have already referred to the Dean of Guild Court, where plans of buildings proposed to be erected in Glasgow have to be lodged; and I can show from one of these plans that one of these buildings, which I have had an opportunity of looking at particularly, was intended for other purposes than teaching. It is erected on the ground acquired under the last deed that was put in. There is no doubt that the reference in the deed to the object of the trust would lead to connection with parish work, but you find that on that property there is provision made for what is described in the Catholic Directory as "a regular friary."

2160. It is agreed between the vendors "and the Most Reverend Charles Eyre, Archbishop of the Romon Catholic Church in Scotland; the Right Reverend John Gray, Bishop of the Roman Catholic Church in the western district of Scotland; and the Very Reverend Livin Anthony Emmanuel Kenners, parish priest of St. Francis Roman Catholic parish, Glasgow, as trustees for behoof of the Roman Catholic congregation of St. Francis, Glasgow, on the second part, in manner following; that is to say, the said first party,

arty, in consideration of the feu duty," and so on, "all and whole that plot and area of ground" which is there described, "to and in favour of the said Most Reverend Charles Eyre, the said Right Reverend John Gray, and the said Very Reverend Livin Anthony Emmanuel Kenners, and their respective successors, in their respective offices of archbishop, bishop, and parish priest foresaid, as trustees foresaid, and their assignees and disponees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably." What is there in that that does not show conclusively that it is a mere parochial trust, a missionary trust?—I refer the Committee to page 75 of the Catholic Directory, where the building erected upon the property of which this is the title, is thus described: "The Franciscan Recollect Fathers, from Belgium, having secured, last year, a suitable plot of land in Cumberland-street, South-side, have succeeded in creating a regular friary, in the old style proper to their order. The building, of a severe Gothic character, has been designed by Gilbert Blount, of London; it consists of two wings, each 80 feet long, and these are connected on the east by the chapter-room and cloister, on the west by a cloister; the whole range of building extends on the east side to the length of 140 feet; the north wing chapter-room and cloisters are used as a temporary chapel, and give accommodation to 900 persons. These premises were solemnly opened on the 11th of July by his Grace the Most Reverend Dr. Eyre, archbishop, &c., assisted by a large number of clergy, secular and regular, and an immense concourse of people. The south wing is occupied by the members of the community, and also affords accommodation for retreats for a limited number of gentlemen. The object of the Franciscan Fathers is to take charge of the parish, assist other priests in their duties, give missions and retreats, and carry out the prescriptions of their holy rule." That is the statement given by the Catholics themselves.

2161. I do not think you read the first sentence, which is, "Day, night, and Sunday schools have also been opened; average 300"?—That is a separate paragraph.

2162. It does appear there that there are Catholic schools, and that the object of these fathers is to take charge of the parish?—To assist the regular priests; to "assist other priests in their duties."

2163. Do you know anybody else who is in charge of the parish except the gentlemen who may happen to be occupying that house?—I know that there is a Catholic chapel on the south side, and not very far from this particular site.

2164. Mr. Jessel.] "All and whole that plot or area of ground containing 7,666 square yards and six square feet or thereby, imperial measure," and then comes the boundary?—The property was not built at the time that deed was drawn. But here are the plans of the property now constructed (producing them).

2165. Where did you get them from?—They are lodged in the Dean of Guild Court, with the application from the proprietor for liberty to erect these buildings.

2166. Then it appears from that application that the buildings of which you now produce a plan were erected on that site?—It does.

2167. So that the archbishop, the bishop, and the Rev. Emmanuel Kenners were the persons who erected the building?—That appears from the petition. (The Witness explained the plan to the Committee.)

2168. Chairman.] The plans were deposited because the site is within the municipality?—Yes.

2169. And they have been carried out?—Yes.

2170. There was no objection on the part of the authorities?—No objection that I know of.

2172. Mr. Matthews.] What is there in all this inconsistent with the trustees of this Roman Catholic congregation having thought fit to entrust the parochial work of that mission to Franciscan Fathers, or Recollect Fathers, or whatever they are called?—I do not say that there is anything inconsistent, but there is something in addition; that is to say, in addition to the regular parochial work, assuming it to be one of the objects of this body, they also contemplate, and have built this as a regular friary, and for carrying out the prescriptions of their "holy rule;" what those may be, I do not know.

2173. That you assume from the Directory?—That is what is stated by themselves, and what I assume to be correct.

2174. Now, I observe that Mr. Monteith is mentioned as a trustee in one of these deeds?—He is one of three trustees.

2175. He is a layman of considerable wealth and influence in the neighbourhood of Glasgow, is he not?—Yes.

2177. Do you know of any other layman of fortune and position?—I do not know of any Roman Catholic of equal position to Mr. Monteith in the Glasgow district.

2178. Perhaps you will know this; is there not a very large preponderating population in Glasgow of poor Irish who are Roman Catholics, with very few Catholics of either wealth or position among them?—I should say it is so, speaking with reference to Roman Catholics alone.

2179. Does not that make the work, both of missions and of teaching, extremely difficult and onerous, inasmuch as there are few people to bear the burden?—It will increase the work, and the onerousness of it.

2180. If these people whom you describe did not assist in that work, do you think that there are means among the Roman Catholic congregation of Glasgow to carry it out?—I am not sufficiently acquainted with the Roman Catholic Church to answer the question; these institutions are of recent introduction, and there has been no sudden accession of numbers to the Roman Catholics.

2181. There has been a great immigration of Irish since the famine, has there not?—They have increased since that time.

2182. About these trust-deeds; I understood you, before the model deed were introduced, the Scotch courts had to say which of two dissident bodies in the Free Church was entitled to the possession of property devoted to the religious uses of that church?—There has been no question before the Scotch courts with reference to the property of the Free Church as yet; the cases to which I referred were cases mostly before the date of the Free Church.

2183. In what body do they arise; in the United Presbyterians?—In the bodies which are now connected with the United Presbyterians; mostly in connection with the bodies which have become merged in the United Presbyterians.

2184. It was in that way that the question came before the courts before these model deeds were introduced, if two branches of a congregation, or church, disputed about which was entitled to retain possession of a property devoted to religious purposes?—Not two branches of the church, but perhaps two sections of a congregation.

2186. And the one which did represent the traditional doctrines of that congregation was held entitled to the property?—Yes.

2187. Now, as I understand, the object of the model deeds has been to withdraw from all civil tribunals the cognizance of all doctrine?—Yes.

2192. In reference to these premises at Lanark, will you produce the deed which you have given an extract of, in answer to Question 1860, where you are asked, "Have you got that which relates to the other portion?"—I have not full copies of the other deeds. These (pointing to them) are full copies from the minute book, into which a short abstract of the deed is entered when it is placed in the registration office. I did not think it necessary to make full copies of all the other deeds, because having compared them, I found them substantially the same.

2193. You thought it right not to take a full copy of this "Notarial instrument in favour," and so on?—That is a full copy of the deed as it appears in the register.

2194. You did not think it necessary to take a full copy of this as you did for the Smyllum Institution?—What I hold in my hand is a complete copy.

2195. It gives the names of the grantors, and the amount of the purchase-money?—Yes.

2196. Could you tell me who was the party conveying the property, and who paid the purchase-money of this property, at Lanark, St. Mary's, Smyllum, which is some distance, I suppose, from the other property of St. Mary's?—Yes, a short distance.

2197. And separated from it?—Yes.

2199. Can you tell me from whom that was purchased; do you happen to know personally?—I do not know personally; I saw the name, but I did not take any notice of it; I thought the name of the seller was of no consequence.

2200. Do you happen to know that this property was paid for by Mr. Monteith, of Carstairs?—I think I did observe, speaking from recollection, that one of the properties had been previously in the possession of Mr. Monteith before it was made over to these trustees.

2201. And you ascertained that Mr. Monteith had conveyed this property voluntarily for this purpose; but you did not think it necessary that that should appear. That document, in fact, does not give us the same information with regard to St. Mary's that the other document does with regard to the Smyllum Institution?—It is a complete copy of what is in the Minute Book. It is sufficient to identify the entry with the particular deed, that is all.

2202. I want to ascertain from you whether you are not aware that Mr. Monteith had himself conveyed a portion of this property for this purpose, and had done so with the view of establishing this institution there?—I say that according to my recollection it is so.

2203. You spoke of this property having cost about 18,000*l.*?—That is the building.

2204. Is that your own estimate?—It is partly my own estimate, and it is partly the result of the information which I received in the locality.

2205. May I ask from whom did you inquire in the locality?—I was in communication in the locality with a gentleman, who acted for a considerable time as the assessor and valuator of the property under the Valuation Act; the gentleman who held the same official position in Lanark as the previous witness did in Perth.

2206. Did you happen to inquire at the institution itself?—I did not.

2207. Did you happen to inquire of Mr. Monteith who lived at Carstairs?—No.

2208. Whatever may have been the expense of erecting the church and buildings there, you do not know who contributed it?—I do not.

2209. Did you ever hear that it was contributed by Mr. Monteith?—That is publicly stated; it is understood that Mr. Monteith has been a very good friend of the Roman Catholic Church there, and I know that a very considerable effort was made to raise money by lotteries, either for the church, or for the orphanage, I am not sure which.

2210. Have you been in the hospital at Lanark?—I was not inside any of the buildings.

2211. Then of course you were not inside the Smyllum Institution either?—No.

2212. This party to whom you have referred merely said that the money thus expended, amounting amounting to 18,000 l., was the property of this congregation; but however, from the explanation, and from what is notoriously a fact known to the public there, it appears that that money was the very munificent gift of Mr. Monteith?—That is quite understood by the public, but I have no information in regard to it.

2213. Mr. Jessel.] Do you know whether, by the law of Scotland, a conveyance in trust for the benefit of the congregation of a particular parish without more, is a valid charitable trust?—I would think so.

2214. How would that be executed; for what purposes would that land be applicable?—May I ask whether you were speaking of the case of property acquired for a particular purpose?

2215. My question was this: a conveyance of property to trustees, in trust for the benefit of the congregation of a particular parish without more, would that be, according to the law of Scotland, a valid charitable trust?—It is certainly very indefinite; I would not be quite prepared to say that it would.

2216. Would you look at this document, to which you were referring just now; can you find anything in that except these words: "as trustees for behoof of the Roman Catholic congregation of St. Francis, of Glasgow;" would that make a valid charitable trust?—It makes a valid trust; but I understood you that you were speaking with reference to the powers of the congregation in dealing with the trustees. Now, I do not know to what extent it would constitute a right in any member of the congregation to require the trustees to follow any particular course of conduct with reference to the property.

2217. I see this is an excerpt from the feu contract?—Yes.

2218. Have you any copy of the conveyance itself?—I have not.

2220. Would nothing more be registered than this, which is contained in this excerpt?—Yes, certainly; that is a mere excerpt from the deed.

2221. Mr. Matthews.] I thought that professed to be the whole deed?—No; it gives the names of the grantor and grantee, and the description of the property, with any indication of a trust which the deed contains.

2222. Mr. Jessel.] But there would be of course a full copy of the conveyance somewhere?—Yes.

2223. In the Register of Sasines, I suppose?—Yes.

2224. Did you look to see what the trusts were?—I looked to see that there were no purposes of trusts beyond what is stated in that excerpt.

2225. There is nothing more stated?—Nothing more in the way of trust.

2226. Would a mere description of the parties, and a conveyance to those parties as trustees foresaid, make a valid trust according to the law of Scotland to that congregation?—The property would be validly conveyed to the trustees; but to what extent it would create an interest in the members of the congregation, as against the trustees, I am not prepared to state.

2227. Chairman.] Does it create a trust at all?—It must be a trust.

2230. There is a trust to those persons "as trustees for behoof of the Roman Catholic congregation of St. Francis, Glasgow"?—The measure of the trust the parties founding upon the deed would require to establish.

2231. But the whole property is conveyed to such trustees as foresaid; supposing that you convey property to A., B., C., "as trustees for the Roman Catholic congregation of St. Francis, Glasgow," would not that create a trust?—No doubt.

2234. Are you sure?—I am sure.

2236. Mr. Jessel.] Do you consider that a trust for a Roman Catholic congregation is or is not a charitable gift in trust for the religious wants of that congregation?—I have some difficulty in the word "charitable."

2238. Exclusively?—It would depend upon the relationship between the parties.

2239. The phrase, "trust for the congregation," may mean two things; it may mean either a trust for the congregation as Roman Catholic, that is, for religious purposes; or it may mean a trust for the individuals of that congregation which happens to be Roman Catholic; it might be for the sick or poor, or anything else, and it would still be charitable, would it not?—I do not quite follow the question.

2240. You see that they are only trustees for "behoof of the Roman Catholic congregation of St. Francis, Glasgow"?—Yes.

2241. What does that mean?—I say I cannot tell precisely what that means, because I do not know the relationship which exists between the members members of a Roman Catholic congregation and their ecclesiastics.

24 June 1870.

2242. Suppose it was in trust "for the United Presbyterian congregation of St. Francis, Glasgow," then what would happen, according to the law of Scotland? — Then, in that case, what would happen would be this: the court would ascertain, from the published documents of the Church, what are the principles of the Church; and in the event of a question arising between the members as to the right to the property, that party would be found entitled to the property which adhered most closely to the original terms of the contract under which the property was acquired.

2243. Supposing that there is no contract, but that it is the donation of an individual, and assume, further, that the one party or the other wished to apply the property to some purpose not immediately connected with the religion of the United Presbyterians; would the court allow that?—I think not.

2245. Under such a trust as that, without more, could you apply the property for the purpose of schools, say, for members of that congregation?—The opinion that I ventured to express in regard to Roman Catholic trusts was this, that these trusts seem to place the application of the property in the hands of the ecclesiastics, they being an external authority, there being no trace either in the deeds, or, so far as I know, in the practice of the Roman Catholic Church of a right in the laity to a voice in the management of its ecclesiastical property.

2246. If you conveyed property to those persons as trustees for the Presbyterian congregation of a parish, would or would not the property be exclusively devoted to religious purposes?—Yes, it would, I think.

2250. Let me put it to you in another way: suppose that you have a trust for any congregation at all of any parish, what meaning should you attach to that, would it be to supply the religious wants of that congregation, or to supply the material wants of the congregation?—The question is so wide that I could scarcely, I think, answer it in the form in which it is put; I would reason in this way, that the court in construing such a trust would have regard to the relative rights of the parties under the constitution of the Church or congregation.

2251. What sort of rights?—Take this case: supposing that in a Presbyterian church, under such deeds as those which I have produced today, the management of the property is entirely with the people.

2252. I have nothing to do with management, you know; I am asking you to what purposes the property would be applicable, not who shall apply it; let me put it to you in another way; could it be used for any purpose but a religious purpose in connection with the congregation?—I do not know sufficient of the constitution of the Roman Catholic Church to answer that question.

2253. Mr. Newdegate.] You have heard, and you have spoken of the "parish of St. Francis"?—Yes.

2254. Is that a parish recognised by the law of Scotland?—It is not.

2255. It is a purely Roman Catholic definition?—Yes.

2256. Made by the same authority which has constituted its establishment?—Well, I presume so.

2257. It is purely Roman Catholic?—That is what I mean, that it is entirely a matter of Roman Catholic jurisdiction; it is not a civil matter.

2258. You have heard the term "congregation," and you have been questioned about the congregation; and "the congregation," and this "parish of St. Francis," have been put before you as identical; the word "parish" has a Roman Catholic definition; has not, in your opinion, the word "congregation" also a Roman Catholic definition?—Entirely.

2259. Are you aware that there are societies extending throughout Europe all comprehended in the Roman Catholic sense under the term congregation?—I have heard it so stated, but I have no special knowledge.

2260. Have you also heard it stated that these congregations have various purposes, and various objects, all considered by them religious?—I do not know what a Roman Catholic might consider religious purposes; he might consider something as a religious purpose which I should not.

2261. Then I understand you that the term "parish," as applied to those districts around the establishment about which you have been giving evidence, is a Roman Catholic term?—Yes, it is a Roman Catholic parish.

2262. Do you not believe that the term congregation

gregation has also a Roman Catholic sense peculiar to itself, just as the word parish has, upon which my previous question rested?—That is so. What I endeavoured to bring out was just this: that the court would endeavour to find what a Roman Catholic congregation was, and what were its rights in a question with its ecclesiastical superiors, and they would dispose of the property accordingly.

2263. Mr. Sherlock.] Do you not know that by a parish is meant a certain portion of land within certain limits?—The common meaning of "parish" is just a certain district of country.

2264. Have you any doubt upon your own mind that the word "congregation," taken in connection with the word "parish," means the inhabitants of that particular locality?—Speaking of that as a Roman Catholic term, I cannot undertake to say.

2265. I ask you, have you any doubt in your own mind?—I have no knowledge of what is the precise meaning attached to that term in the Roman Catholic Church.

2267. Mr. Sherlock.] Have you any doubt upon your own mind that in this particular instrument the word "congregation," taken in connection with the word "parish," means the inhabitants of that particular district referred to as the Roman Catholic parish?—I could not answer that question otherwise than by saying that the terms here must be used in the Roman Catholic sense, and what that sense is I do not know.

2268. I asked you whether you had any doubt upon your own mind; can you say whether you have any doubt or not that in this particular instrument the congregation means the inhabitants of that locality?—I have no information to enable me to form an opinion.

2269. You have formed no opinion?—Not upon that point, at all.

2270. Mr. Matthews.] If I left you land as trustee "for the Presbyterian congregation of St. Francis, Glasgow," should you think yourself justified in selling that land and dividing the price among all those who dwelt in the parish?—I think not.

2271. Would you think yourself justified in founding with the money a school for teaching the United Presbyterian religion?—In the case of money left in the very vague terms which you gave, I should suppose that very much was left in the discretion of the trustee.

2272. Would you think yourself justified in founding out of the proceeds of land left to you as trustee of the "United Presbyterian Congregation of St. Francis, Glasgow," a school for teaching the United Presbyterian religion to the inhabitants of that parish?—Not as we understand a school, because a school and a church with us are very different things.

2273. Would you feel yourself justified, under those circumstances, in founding a school for teaching United Presbyterian doctrines to the children of United Presbyterians who had lived in the parish of St. Francis?—I would say it was very doubtful.

2274. You are not clear that it would not be lawful?—We have nothing quite analogous to what you put. You are speaking of Presbyterian practice which I happen to know.

2275. You have no such thing as a school for teaching religion?—Not in that sense.

2276. Would you think yourself justified in founding a church for the purposes of worship for the United Presbyterians living in the parish of St. Francis?—I should think that there would be no difficulty in that.

2277. You are quite clear that an application of the revenue for the purposes of worship, would be a lawful administration of the trust?—I should think so.

2278. You have doubt about an educational application, because you have no such thing as a religious education among the United Presbyterians?—We have such a thing, but not in the sense in which you put it.

Mr. Alfred Smee, called in; and Examined.

2279. Mr. Newdegate.] I think you are the Medical Officer of the Bank of England?—I am.

2280. And also a member of several societies?—A Fellow of the Royal Society, and Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons.

2281. I think in 1864 you prepared a petition, which was presented to the House of Commons, with respect to some circumstances connected with the life, illness, death, and burial of a connection of yours, the Rev. Mr. Hutchison?—I did; of William Hutchison, called by the Oratory, Anthony Hutchison, and upon his tombstone, William Anthony Hutchison. I always state these matters, that hereafter his true name may be known.

Mr. ALFRED SMEE, re-called; and further Examined.

Mr. Smee. 28 June 1870.

2282. Mr. Newdegate.] SINCE your last evidence was given, a question has arisen as to whether the Oratorians are a religious society in the sense which I will read to you, and I will then ask you whether you have any evidence to give to the effect that they are so; this Committee is appointed "to inquire into the state of the law respecting conventual and monastic institutions or societies in Great Britain, and into the terms upon which income, property, and estates belonging to such institutions or societies, or to members thereof, are respectively received, held, or possessed;" and by a resolution, which the Committee has adopted, I am bound to examine you, in the first instance, as to the Oratorian Society; do you consider that society to be a community possessing any common property?—I consider it to be a monastic institution having common property.

2283. And you are prepared to produce evidence to that effect?—Most certainly.

2284. That point was touched upon in the trial to which you were a party, namely, the trial of Smee versus Knox, and others; and I have a copy here of the judgment of the court; I will read some passages of that, and ask you whether, having heard that decision given, this report concurs with your recollection; did you hear the judge, Sir James Wilde, now Lord Penzance, say, in giving his judgment, "I am bound to say that the impression produced on my mind by the evidence is by no means to the effect that, as was suggested, Mr. Smee had any desire whatever to possess himself of his relative's property"?—I did.

2285. Did you hear this also: "Mr. Smee was quite right in endeavouring to dissuade his relative from taking a course which he thought would be fatal to his eternal happiness, and Mr. Hutchison was equally right in resisting Mr. Smee's efforts. That correspondence seems to me to have very little bearing on the issues to be tried, which are, first, whether the will and codicil were made by the testator at a time when he was of sound and disposing mind; and, secondly, whether they were made under the undue influence of anyone then about him. The case set up against the will is, that the testator had for years been affected with a nervous complaint, which impaired his mind; that it had impaired some of his bodily functions is plain from the evidence on both sides; but had it impaired his mind? Upon such a question the court naturally looks to the positive evidence on the one side, and on the other, as to his acts, and speech, and writings, while under the influence of the disease; and, in the face of evidence of that character, suggestions, even of the highest scientific men, that possibly his mind might be affected, would have very little weight. The very eminent gentlemen who were called on the part of defendant, at once said, with that candour and honesty of purpose which distinguishes their profession, that they could not undertake to say that his mind was impaired; and when I cast my eyes upon the evidence on the other side, it is not too much to say that it is overwhelming"?—Yes.

2286. "They all agree that he was suffering from nervous disease, from partial paralysis of a portion of the nerves, arising from tumour or some other injury at the base of the brain; that the nervous disease increased and finally caused his death, but that it was a species of nervous disease which might exist without affecting the brain, and that they saw not the slightest trace of any affection of the mind;" did you hear that?—I did.

2287. Did you hear this: "Those are the dry facts, and nothing was elicited to show that the slightest pressure was exercised on him, or that there was the slightest interference with him with regard to the free disposition of his property"?—Yes.

2288. Did you hear this also (this is important) "The rules of the society have been examined and neither the rules nor the established customs in any way affect the disposition of the property of the members"?—I did.

2289. Such was the judgment; and now I wish to put to you this question: Were you satisfied with that part of the decision of the court which was to the effect that "the rules of the society have been examined, and neither the rules nor the established customs in any way affect the disposition of the property of the members"?—I was not satisfied with the decision at all.

2290. The decision of the court turned chiefly upon the sanity and competence of the testato t his death?—I should say that it turned upon vo things. One was that there was not suffi- ent evidence of, I may say, the infirmity of the stator at the time that he made his will. That uestion was put to me distinctly by the judge, ho is extremely acute in matters of evidence. Ie said, "Did you see yourself any proof of nsanity when you saw him about the time of aking his will?" I said that I saw no insane elusion whatever, but that his mind was weak- ned from disease of the brain. It was weak- ess, imbecility, not insanity. Then the other oint that seemed to weigh upon the court was at priest after priest of the Oratory, I would ather say monks of the Oratory, got up and vore that they were unbound by vow, that they ake no vow at all, and that they were free to o out and to do whatever they liked without eing bound by any vow at all.

2291. Did you understand from the decision of he court that the court had decided that because ese Oratorians said they were not bound by ows, therefore the Oratorian establishment was ot a conventual or monastic institution?—I ink it went towards that; I do not think it ent so strongly as that, but that would be the ndency. I think that the tendency in the dge's mind was that being unbound by vows they swore (which I did not believe), they ere not therefore monks or a monastic institu- on.

2292. What I want to know is this: the de- sion chiefly turned upon the competence of our deceased relative to dispose of his property, d it not?—Yes, that was the chief point de- dedly.

2293. The minor point as to the character of is institution arose only incidentally?—I am ot prepared to say that it was quite incidental; think that it was material in influencing the dge's mind, but still that part of the question ould have been tried in Chancery, I fancy, not law.

2294. And it was your intention to have tried in Chancery?—Yes, and I will now if I have fficient assistance; there is time left now, I lieve, to try the validity of the appropriation the money to the monastic institution of the ratory of Brompton.

2295. Why did you not do that at the time?—On account of the very heavy expense.

2296. This trial put you to a great expense?—Yes, I can show you the bills; I may state at our friend Mr. Few tried to charge me over 8 l. more than was allowed.

2297. You were deterred from proceeding with e trial, as you intended, in Chancery by the pense?—Solely; but if anyone would have sisted me I would have tried it, and will try it w, if assisted.

2299. Will you be good enough to take that py (handing it to the Witness), and read the o first letters?—"Sir,—I am the present perior of a Roman Catholic college at Bromp- n, commonly called the Oratory; our com- unity possesses a country house with nine acres 0.92. of ground on Sydenham Hill, and we are anxious to set apart a small portion of this ground as a burial-place for ourselves only. Our community is now 20 in number, and may possibly average hereafter 25 members. I believe that Sydenham is within the Act of Parliament boundaries, which render your consent necessary; may I request to be informed what steps are necessary for us in order to bring this request in a regular manner before your department. I have, &c. (signed) Fred. William Faber, D.D. The Right Honourable the Secretary of State for the Home Department." That is dated the 3rd of September 1856. Then Mr. H. Waddington to the Rev. F. W. Faber, D.D. "Whitehall, 4 September 1856. Sir,—I am directed by Secretary Sir George Grey to acknowledge your letter of the 3rd instant, and to inform you that if the ground which you desire to set apart as a burial-place for your community is within the district of the Metropolitan Interment Act, it cannot be used without the sanction of the Secretary of State. If you will send a letter asking for approval, it will be referred to an inspector of burial grounds for his report."

2300. Did you know Father Faber as superior of that order?—I know that he was superior and I have seen him, and that is all; I never spoke to him.

2301. But you knew it for a fact from the correspondence?—I know that he has been pointed out for the superior. He has always been spoken of by my brother-in-law as superior.

2302. In the will of your late relative, did he not place the whole conduct of his funeral in the hands of Mr. Faber, if he should be then living, as superior of the order?—I think not in the will that was proved.

2303. Did it appear in the draft of will which was furnished to you by the Court of Chancery?—A draft was furnished to me on the trial by the Court of Probate.

2304. I think if you read it you will find that your late relative did do what I put to you?—It comes in the script.

2305. What do you mean by the script?—The plaintiff has to put in all the documents before the Court of Probate relating to a will and all former wills.

2306. I will read this to you, and ask you whether it is a part of the script; this is a draft will of deceased dated 1st February 1855: "This is the last Will and Testament of me, the Reverend William Hutchison of Brompton, in the county of Middlesex, clerk. Whereas, by a certain indenture dated the 29th day of May 1854, and made or expressed to be made between me, the Reverend William Hutchison, the Reverend Thomas Francis Knox, and the Reverend Edward Gilpin Bagshawe of the first part, the Reverend Frederick William Faber and others, of the second part, the Reverend John Dobree Dalgairns, of the third part, and Elizabeth Bowden, widow, of the fourth part, certain real and personal estate therein mentioned or referred to, being the then common property of the congregation of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri at Brompton aforesaid, was declared to be vested in the parties thereto of the first part, upon certain trusts therein particularly declared for the benefit of the said congregation of the Oratory at Brompton aforesaid. But it was hereby declared that in case the trusts thereby declared, or any of them, should be invalid trusts according to the doctrines of the High Court of Chancery, the said parties thereto of the first part should be deemed in equity as well as at law to be absolutely entitled to the aforesaid real and personal estate and premises free from any trusts enforceable in any court of equity or otherwise." Is that part of the script?—That is the first paragraph of script No. 5, dated the 1st of February 1855.

2307. It then goes on to get rid of the trusts; then there are these words: "And I hereby devise and bequeath the same unto and to the use of such persons or person, if any, as at or immediately after my decease shall be; or supposing the trusts of the said indenture of the 29th day of May 1854 to be valid, would be, trustees or trustee thereof, their or his heirs, executors, or administrators respectively; but if there shall be no such persons or person, then unto and to the use of the person who at my decease shall be the Superior of the said congregation, his heirs, executors, or administrators; or if there shall be no Superior of the said congregation at my decease, then unto and to the use of such person as shall first become such Superior within 12 calendar months after my decease, his heirs, executors, and administrators;" and throughout this draft I think this congregation is treated as a community, and it was the object of the testator to leave to the Superior of that community for their use certain property?—Certainly.

2308. Then the will of 1855 contains, in fact, the same terms as that draft?—Yes.

2309. I need not read them again, because they are identical; but in this instance and always, your relative considered himself to be a member of a community, and you understood it to be his intention to give his property, including some 8,000*l.* that he had advanced for building this institution at Brompton, and such property as he had at his decease, to some members of that congregation for the common benefit thereof?—I entertain no doubt that the moment he joined it, his property was really vested in that congregation, and that whatever circuitous methods might be practised, he was bound to give every farthing that he possessed to them as under a vow of poverty. I may mention a very striking illustration of that. His sister begged him to let her have a small piece of the old family plate with the crest on it, and told him that she would give him twice its value if he would give it her, and he said, "No; it all belongs to the congregation, and I should have to ask Father Faber and the others about it, and I will not do that." It was a great grievance to her that he would not even sell her one spoon with the old family crest upon it.

2310. I must again ask you to look at the Parliamentary Paper from which you read just now; read a letter from his Grace the Duke of Norfolk to the Right Honourable Sir George Grey, which you will find there?—"His Grace the Duke of Norfolk to the Right Honourable Sir George Grey, Bart. Arundel Castle, Saturday, 27 September 1856. Sir,—May I write to you on the subject of a burial ground for which the fathers of the Oratory have petitioned, in their own ground at Sydenham. They have at Sydenham nine acres of land, and they are very anxious for permission to make, in their own ground, a small cemetery for the interment solely of the members of their own community. This community consists of a small number of persons, averaging from 25 to 35; and they have lost but one member by death in the last seven years. The privilege is one which has always been prized by religious communities to a degree I can hardly describe to you; they like to walk among their deceased friends, and pray for them, and recommend them to the prayers of the younger members. I feel satisfied that you will not find, upon inquiry, any valid objection upon sanitary grounds. May I therefore earnestly beg your favourable consideration of their petition, which will confer upon them, without detriment to others, a really great boon. I have, &c. —Norfolk. The Right Honourable Sir George Grey, Baronet."

2311. The late Duke of Norfolk evidently considered them a community, possessing their property at Sydenham, which they desired to convert into a burial ground for themselves exclusively as a quasi corporation?—Certainly.

2312. I need not pursue this further than by asking you whether you recollect, in this correspondence, a letter from Mr William Massey to Mr. R. D. Grainger, to this effect: "Whitehall, 4th October 1856. Sir,—In calling your attention to the two letters from the Reverend Dr. Faber, Superior of the Oratory, forwarded to you in Mr. Waddington's letter of the 8th ultimo, I am directed by Secretary Sir G. Grey to transmit to you herewith a letter from the Duke of Norfolk on the subject of the proposed new cemetery at Sydenham, for the members of the said community, and to request that you will report thereon at your early convenience. I am, &c. W. Massey;" therefore Mr. Massey recognised this Order as a community, and the license was issued, was it not?—I am told that the license was issued; but even after formal application to the Secretary of State, he never would allow me either to see the license or have a copy of the license, and said he would only give it to some one applying in Parliament.

2313. I will put this to you; the ground was understood to be licensed, and used as licensed, was it not?—It was used as licensed. I was present, and anyone who is present is liable to a heavy penalty where it is not licensed.

2314. And the funeral of your relative was conducted as being a member of that community?—It was; I was present.

2315. And, in your first evidence, you stated that you had complained that his name was not properly described upon the tombstone?—In the first place, my first complaint was that there was no evidence to show to what part of the earth's surface this license appertained.

2316. That is another matter; but you complained that your relative's name was not legally given upon his tombstone?—Yes.

2317. Was the alteration of the name on the tombstone made in consequence of your relative being a member of that Order?—So they stated.

2318. Mr. O'Reilly.] Who are they?—The priests of the Oratory.

2319. Will you kindly name the man who made the statement?—I believe it was Dr. Knox, as far as I know.

2320. Do you mean to say it was?—I believe that I asked him; I am uncertain about that.

2321. Mr. Newdegate.] But you can produce a correspondence, I think, that will show it?—Our complaint was this, that whereas his name was

as William, he was called upon his tombstone William Anthony, and at the Oratory Anthony, nd the consequence of that will be that, 50 years ence, in regard to property in succession in our mily, we shall be driven, but for this correspondnce, to prove the identity of William, William nthony, and Anthony, and we say it is a great rievance in the laws of this country that his ame should be permitted to be so mis-stated.

2322. Chairman.] Was there a correspondence n that subject between you and any of the entlemen connected with the Oratory?—No, it as with Sir George Grey.

2323. Mr. O'Reilly.] Showing that it was hanged in consequence of his being a member f that community?—He stated that himself, nd I state it emphatically now.

2324. Mr. Newdegate.] You attended your elative in the house at Sydenham, belonging to he Oratorians, did you not?—I saw him in the ouse at Sydenham; I did not absolutely attend im there; I attended him in the Oratory at Brompton.

2325. You have stated that he was known by the name of Anthony among the Oratorians?—Yes; he had that name when he was taken into their community.

2326. That is the name by which he was admitted into their community?—Yes.

2327. You state that you are positive of that fact?—Yes, I am positive that it is what he stated at the time, because his sister grievously complained of his being called Anthony.

2328. He stated that it was in consequence of his admission into that community?—Yes.

2329. Chairman.] Was he ever called Anthony before?—No.

2330. Or William Anthony?—No; William is his simple name. This is the state of the case: his family name is William; all his property goes by the name of William; his will is signed William; he is then registered in the register of deaths as William; his death is advertised as William Anthony; he is then described on his tombstone as William Anthony; and there is no register of burial that I have ever been able to get at, although we got an Act of Parliament passed afterwards to compel registration of burials; I have sent over and over again for the burial extract, and have been refused.

2331. Sent to where?—To the Oratory at Brompton, and I wrote to Father Faber, and asked him for it.

2332. Mr. Newdegate.] I think the Bank of England consider a proper registration of burial very essential in all operations with respect to property?—It used to be invariable at that time, and so it is at most of the insurance offices; there has been an Act modifying it since. I think that the Registrar General's certificate of death is now a more valid document than it was formerly.

2333. The objection you took upon the change of your relative's name upon the tombstone was not founded upon any fancy of your own, but was in accordance with the practice of the Bank of England?—Precisely; and I know that it will give us trouble 50 years hence in our family.

2334. And this erroneous, as you conceive, or illegal description upon the tombstone has never been corrected?—When I saw it last there it was on the tombstone, and all the other names in the churchyard were falsified too.

2335. And this name, Anthony, you believe and declare identified your late relative with this community?—It did.

2336. I will now read to you a copy of the last will of your relative, dated the 24th of July 1860: "This is the last will of me, the Reverend William Hutchison, of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri, Brompton, in the county of Middlesex, clerk. I hereby revoke all former testamentary dispositions. I desire after my death to be buried according to the rites of the Roman Catholic Church, and in such place as the Superior for the time being of the Oratory of the Congregation of London shall think fit;" are those terms in it?—Yes.

2337. It goes on. "I give and bequeath to the Reverend Thomas Francis Knox, of the Oratory aforesaid, the legacy or sum of 30*l.*, and subject thereto, I give, devise, and bequeath all my real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature or kind whatsoever, unto and to the use of the Very Reverend Frederick William Faber, Doctor of Divinity, of the Oratory aforesaid;" that appears in the will, does it not?—Yes.

2339. "His heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, for his and their own absolute use and benefit. And I devise unto and to the use of the said Frederick William Faber and his heirs, or if he shall die in my life, then unto and to the use of the said Charles Bowden and his heirs, all estates, if any, which at my decease may be vested in me as a trustee, or by way of mortgage, but upon the trusts and subject to the equities affecting the same respectively. And I appoint the said Frederick William Faber, or if he shall die in my life, then the said Charles Bowden, sole executor of this my said will," and so forth; these were all members of the same community which your relative entered?—They were all members of the same community, and the will is witnessed by two members of the same community. The clause for witness is this: "Signed, published, and declared by the said William Hutchison, as and for his last will and testament, in the presence of us, who, in his presence, at his request, and in the presence of each other, have hereunto subscribed our names as witnesses, James B. Rowe, Clerk, The Oratory, Brompton, Geo. T. Ballard, Clerk, The Oratory, Brompton;" and that was at a time when his family could get no access to him at all.

2340. Mr. Pemberton.] Was that the will to which probate was ultimately granted?—Yes.

2341. Mr. Gregory.] Was the Probate Act annexed to that copy?—No; the other side would have the probate.

2342. Mr. Pemberton.] Was any objection taken when the probate was applied for?—Yes; we objected the 8th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1869. The words are as follows: "Alfred Smee, and Elizabeth his wife, by Thomas Harris Devonshire, their attorney, say that the paper writings bearing date respectively the 24th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1860, and the 7th day of August, in the year of our Lord 1860, and alleged by the plaintiff plaintiff to be respectively the last will and testament, and the codicil thereto, of the Rev. Wm. Hutchison, late of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri, Brompton, in the county of Middlesex, deceased, were not nor was either of them executed according to the provisions of the statute of the first year of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter 26. Secondly, and for a further plea, the defendants say that the said Reverend William Hutchison, deceased, at the times respectively of the making of the said alleged will and codicil respectively, as in the declaration alleged, was not of sound mind, memory, and understanding. Thirdly, and for a further plea the defendants say that the execution of the said will and codicil respectively was procured by the undue influence of the plaintiff, and of others acting in concert with him." This is a copy of the script given to us for probate.

2343. Mr. Gregory.] But you have not the copy from the Probate Court?—No.

2344. Mr. Newdegate.] Will you take this copy of the Roman Catholic Directory in your hand (handing the same to the Witness), and state the page upon which you see the heading, "Communities of Men"?—Page 111.

2345. Will you read what you find under that heading?—"Augustinian Fathers, St. Monica's, Hoxton-square, N.; Carmelites (Discalced), 5, Vicarage-place, Kensington, W.; Charity (Fathers of), 170, Culford-road, Kingsland, N.; Dominican Fathers, St. Dominic's Priory, Haverstock-hill, N.W.; Jesuit Fathers, 111, Mount-street, W.; St. Mary's, Horseferry-road, Westminster, S.W.; Marist Fathers, St. Anne's, Albert-place, Spicer-street, E.; Oblates of Mary Immaculata, 25, Great Prescot-street, E.; Church of the Sacred Heart, Kilburn, N.W.; Oblates of St. Charles, St. Mary's, Bayswater, W.; Oratory (Fathers of the), Brompton, S.W.

2346. Then among these "Communities of Men," you find in the Roman Catholic Directory, "Oratory (Fathers of the), Brompton, S.W."?—Yes.

2347. Is that the correct address and description of the Oratorians whom your deceased relative joined?—Yes.

2348. I will now put a general question to you; having known that your relative was for 11 years a member of that community, have you the slightest doubt that that community constitutes an institution and society of a monastic or conventual character?—Not the remotest. In fact, he wore a monkish garment until the Queen's proclamation made him take it off.

2349. Mr. Gregory.] What do you mean by the Queen's proclamation?—I think there was an Act, or a proclamation to the effect that monkish vestments were illegal in the streets. There was some excitement about that some years ago; and he used to come to our house constantly in those garments.

2350. Mr. Pemberton.] Will you tell me what you consider to be the essential characteristics of a monastic institution?—Living together bound by vows either of obedience or any other class of vows. I believe St. Philip Neri's in Italy is pronounced to be a monastic institution of that character. It is very difficult to define a monastic institution, but the outward and the visible signs are that they live together and have community of goods. In this case each father as he dies leaves all his property to another father, showing that there is some recondite or some hidden mode in which they act, by which they carry out their vow of poverty, which my relative always declared he had taken.

2351. Is it quite consistent with a community of goods that each person should leave a will?—I think it is if they want to evade the law.

2352. You think that the essence of a monastic institution is that the members should be bound by vows and have property in common?—Property in common or quasi in common. I look upon their mode of doing it as nothing else but a mode of evading the law; and we have here amongst the scripts counsel's opinion as to how to evade the law.

2353. Mr. Newdegate.] Should you have any objection to put that script in?—No; the opinion was produced in court amongst the script, and it shows how they attempted to evade the law.

2354. Chairman.] Was the script produced in court?—The script was filed in court; this is the copy, given to us on the trial, containing counsel's opinion how to evade the law, and how particularly to avoid that the next of kin should ever deal with any part of the funds of the Oratory, which they contemplated might be attempted, and which they are there shown how to avoid.

2355. Mr. Pemberton.] I suppose counsel's opinion was given at the end of a draft will?—Yes.

2356. At the end of some draft will he probably stated his opinion as to the proper mode of carrying it out legally?—It is signed "W. H. G. Bagshawe, Lincoln's Inn."

2357. Chairman.] It is part of the affidavit?—It is part of the affidavit of Dr. Knox.

2358. Mr. O'Keilly.] Am I right in understanding that in answer to Mr. Pemberton you stated your view as to what would constitute a religious community in the words that Mr. Newdegate read to you, "of a monastic or conventual character," by saying that it would be the fact of the members being bound by vows of poverty or other vows?—I think that the vow of obedience, which the whole course of my relative's life showed, constituted just as much a monastic vow as a vow of poverty.

2359. But I take it that you emphatically consider that the characteristic of a monastic or conventual institution is that there should be vows either of obedience or of poverty?—Not solely; you must judge by the whole circumstances of the case. If you ask me I should regard that as something like a definition; but it requires very grave study to settle such a definition as to meet all cases as we find them in the external world.

2360. But in this case your opinion is, that the Oratorians do come under that definition, in consequence of being bound by certain vows?—No, I first take the circumstances as a whole; I first take the appearance of community, of property. I have another will of another father, who leaves his property to William Hutchison and somebody else; and I can produce other wills to show that Father Faber left property in the same way. Now that shows that the will was just a finishing off of a line of conduct which they had already commenced.

2361. But am I not correct in stating that one of the reasons why you consider the congregation of the Oratory to come under this definition which has been read to you, is the fact, as you state it, that each member must leave all his property to some other member of the same community; community; and that they hold all their property in common, or quasi in common?—It is done in a recondite manner. I do not know that they must leave the property so, but the fact would be for a jury to consider that they do leave, and have left, and probably will leave in the future, their property to each other to all eternity, as long as the order of St. Philip Neri exists.

2362. You have used the word pretty often; may I ask whether you would consider that every "community" would come under the words read to you?—I think that were they communities of any other religion they would be just as bad.

2363. Then you think that any community would come under this description, do you?—What do you mean by the word "community"?

2364. You have used the word, and therefore I ask you?—Well, the word "community" means people living in common, and I say this, whether they be Dissenters, or Quakers, or members of any other religious creed, they would be just as bad; they would equally be a monastic institution, and I should have contested this will just as much if the community had been one composed of Jews, or Quakers, or any other religion. I do not contest it upon the religious question, but I take it upon the pure and material fact that the Oratorians did get all Mr. Hutchison's money in this way, which is contrary to the law of the land, as I believe, and contrary to the public policy of the State.

2365. Then am I right in taking from that answer your statement to be that any community of persons living in common, whether Dissenters or any other religion, would in your opinion be members of a conventual or monastic institution, or a religious institution of a conventual or monastic character?—I should be guided by all the other external circumstances that presented themselves. It is very difficult to give an exact definition.

2366. Then the mere fact of living in common would not, in your opinion, constitute it such?—I should say that it would go a certain way towards it and influence my opinion upon that point.

2367. You gave evidence, I think, in this case on the trial before the present Lord Penzance?—I did.

2368. But your conclusions differed, I take it, very largely from his, did they not?—My conclusions differed from his judgment.

2369. I assume that his judgment was in conformity with his conclusions; you have stated that you have no doubt whatever that from the moment your relative joined the congregation, all his property vested in that congregation; am I not right in saying that on the other hand Sir James Wilde stated, "The rules of the society have been examined, and neither the rules nor the established customs in any way affect the disposition of the property of the members"?—Those are his words, but it does not follow that they were all the rules, and it does not follow what rules did bind them. Those are only certain external rules with regard to the government of the house.

2370. Am I right that you stated also, in answer to Mr. Newdegate, that you understood that the court, that is, Sir James Wilde, decided that because the Oratorians were unbound by vows (which, as you stated, you did not believe), they were not members of any monastic or conventual institution?—He did not state that they were not members of a conventual institution. What I stated was that I thought that that influenced his mind; I have no doubt it did, for I watched him all the time.

2371. Am I right in saying that you are as little satisfied with Sir James Wilde's decision as to the validity of the will and the sanity of your relative, as you were with his decision on that point?—I never said he was insane, and I am perfectly satisfied with the decision as showing that he was not insane, but what I said was that his mind was feeble and much more impressionable and emotional from his having organic disease of the brain, than other people's.

2372. Was not your plea that your relative was not of sound mind, memory, and understanding?—Yes, my version of it comes under that plea, that a man with an organic disease of the brain, I believe, is not as free from external influences when they act upon him.

2373. Is this, as far as your memory serves you, a correct extract from your evidence given on that trial, speaking of your relative: "He spoke very little, and seemed in a very stupid state, like a man in a state of intoxication; it was an impairment of the mind"?—Yes, an impairment of mind; that is not an insane impairment, but a lowering of the powers of the mind, a deficiency of the mind. He unmistakably at that time was in a semi-stupid state, from which he greatly recovered afterwards; that is the time when I saw him at Norwood and got to see him by stratagem, for they forbade any of the family coming to him, and then we found afterwards that the will had been made at that time, and that is why they kept us from him.

2374. However, you accept that as the evidence you gave in this court?—That is the evidence, and that is the meaning of the evidence.

2375. Now, am I correct in stating that Sir James Wilde, in his judgment, stated "the evidence on the other side" (that is not your side) "is overwhelming"?—He did so state.

2376. Mr. Newdegate.] To what did that apply?—Sir James Wilde seemed only to entertain the idea of insanity, and spoke of it as a matter of sanity; he said that the evidence as to his sanity was overwhelming.

2377. Mr. O'Reilly.] Did Sir James Wilde also say, "It is fully established that he retained his mental faculties up to the hour of his death"?—He did say so.

2378. Did Sir James Wilde also say, "His letters were those not only of a man of sound mind but of a man of ability"?—He did say so.

2379. Did Sir James Wilde also say, "Those are the dry facts, and nothing was elicited to show that the slightest pressure was exercised on him, or that there was the slightest interference with him with regard to the free disposition of his property"?—Yes, he said so.

2380. Did he also say this, "The learned counsel" (meaning your counsel) "has quoted some glowing language of Sir Samuel Romilly on the subject of religious influence, but no doubt when Sir Samuel Romilly used that language there were some facts in evidence to which it was applicable; this case is wholly destitute of such facts"?—He said so.

2381. Now am I right in saying that the extract, which I have given from your evidence, applied to the state of your relative at an interview view which you had with him on the 9th of September 1860?—Yes; he was at the worst I ever saw him at that moment.

2382. Does this passage occur in the judgment of Sir James Wilde, and does it apply to that part of your evidence, "I find a letter written the very day after Mr. Smee saw him (meaning that 9th of September 1860), which no one could say was written by a man of impaired mind; how does Mr. Smee treat that letter; instead of treating the writer as incapable of transacting business, he writes an answer to him the next day, and says, that until he saw his writing he had no idea that he had any serious ailment;" does that passage occur in Sir James Wilde's judgment?—It does; I can explain that statement in this sense. What I meant by serious ailment was this. He told me that he had had extreme unction, and he was manifestly then apparently at death's door; it seemed that he would have died within a few days, and although I knew that he had organic disease of the brain for a long time previous to that, I did not know that he was so ill as to be at death's door, so that they should give him extreme unction.

2383. Did you know that at the 9th of September, when you then saw him?—I know he was seriously ill then; I did not know he was fatally ill until I saw his writing, which fixed much more on my mind the positively fatal character of his disease, which might have been immediately fatal.

2384. Does this passage also occur in Sir James Wilde's judgment: "There is a total absence of any single fact to show that any human being in the establishment (meaning the Oratory) ever interfered with him as to the provisions that the will contains"?—Yes; no one could get there to find out.

2385. Am I right in saying that he finally decided that "as there were no reasonable ground for contesting the will," Mr. Smee must pay the costs?—Yes.

2386. And you did pay them?—I did pay them, and they tried to charge me 228*l.* in excess, which were struck off.

2387. Now I will take you to one or two other points; you stated that your relative's name was altered, by the addition of Anthony, in consequence of his being a member of the community of the Oratory, did you not?—Yes.

2388. You stated first to me that members of that community stated it to you?—I retracted that upon consideration; I was uncertain; I will not say certainly whether they did or not, but I have a little impression that they did; I will not declare to that.

2389. Then you have also stated that your relative, who is dead (the members of the Oratory being alive), stated it to you; will you retract the certainty with regard to him?—No, certainly not, because we knew his name was Anthony before, and we asked him how he came by that name, and we suggested to him in a playful sort of way that Anthony was said to be a patron of Thieves, and we did not want him to be that.

2390. Mr. Newdegate.] What was his answer?—"We always change our names."

2391. Mr. O'Reilly.] You are quite clear as to your recollection of what your relative, who is dead, said to you, but you are not quite clear as to what the members of the Oratory, who are alive, said?—I am quite clear what they said upon many points, but not on that particular point.

2392. If one of them stated that your relative had taken the name of Anthony when he received the sacrament of confirmation, as is the custom among Roman Catholics, would you be prepared to dispute the accuracy of that statement?—No, but I do not know; how can I dispute what I do not know? I was not present.

2393. Now, you state that your relative gave up wearing a religious dress in consequence of the Queen's proclamation; could you tell me about the date of that?—No, I cannot.

2394. About 1852?—I am very uncertain.

2395. You stated that he did it in consequence of the illegality of wearing the habit of a religious order, I think?—Yes.

2396. Will you be prepared to dispute the fact that it is equally illegal for any Roman Catholic ecclesiastic, whether a member of any order, community, society, or not, to exercise any of the rites or ceremonies of the Roman Catholic religion, or wear the habit of his order, save within the usual places of worship of the Roman Catholic religion, or in private houses, or, in other words, to put it short, does not the prohibition as much apply to any other ecclesiastic as to a member of any religious order or community, the prohibition being contained in the 26th clause of the Emancipation Act, 10 Geo. 4, c. 7?—I am not aware. He used to come to our house in a monk's dress, a tunic, a great dress and hood, just like the monks wear abroad; I am not very learned in them, but my people at home could give you an exact description.

2397-8. Do you state, then, that your relative came to you in a white dress?—It was a monastic dress.

2399. I should like to know the colour, because that is a thing that your memory must be tolerably accurate on?—I will not declare to the colour positively; it was a distinct monastic garment.

2400. I do not wish to insist on shades of colour, but was it light?—I think they called themselves St. Wilfridians at that time.

2401. Was he at that time a member of the congregation of the Oratory?—That was, I think, before the Oratory was established; there were all the same people, but they were living in a different place; they were living in the country.

2402. Now you stated, in answer to Mr. Newdegate, that Father Faber was superior of that order; and in proof of that statement you read, or Mr. Newdegate read, several extracts from wills of your relative, in which Father Faber was spoken of as the superior of the London congregation of the Oratory; allow me to call your attention to the difference, and to ask whether you can bring anything to show that Father Faber was superior of the order?—No, I do not know that I can.

2403. Mr. Matthews.] I have listened with great attention to your evidence; I should like you to tell us what a monastic institution is?—Upon my honour I think you can answer that better than I can.

2404. I think so too; but as you are come here to prove that the Oratorians are a monastic order, will you tell us what a monastic institution is?—I have said that a definition is difficult, but that they live together, have their property in common, and are bound by vows of poverty or obedience; those are some of the attributes.

2405. Are

2405. Are those all that you consider necessary?—Not all; there may be others besides those.

2406. But what characteristics, in your opinion, necessarily belong to a monastic institution?—I do not take one singly, because it might be so placed that there might be a community so designed that it shall not come into that definition.

2407. Take colleges at Oxford and Cambridge; there is property in common, and persons who live in common; are they monastic institutions?—No; they verge towards it in some respects.

2408. Take the Temple and Lincoln's Inn; they have common property, and a good many of them live in common in the buildings situated on common property; are they monastic institutions?—No, no appearance of it at all.

2409. Does not that bring you to this, that vows or common rules, or something of that sort, are necessary to make a monastic institution?—Not necessarily, if their rule is to have no rule, as they have at the Oratory.

2410. In point of fact, you can give us no definition of a monastic institution?—It must be judged by all the circumstances.

2411. What is the circumstance that makes you judge that the Oratorians are a monastic institution?—Not one circumstance, but the whole bearing of the case.

2412. You mean to say that you cannot specify to the Committee the circumstances from which you draw the inference that the Oratorians are a monastic institution?—One thing is, that nothing can be done without leave; the second is, that they were clearly bound by obedience, so far that, I believe, he could not come to our house without leave.

2413. Can a young man leave his college at Oxford without leave?—He was about 45, and therefore was not a young man in that sense when he died.

2414. Obedience in that sense alone will not make a monk?—No; first of all they were ecclesiastics; secondly, they were living in a house in common; thirdly, they were living in a house constructed as monasteries are.

2415. How many monasteries have you been into?—A good many abroad; I have just come from Italy and Rome, where I have seen plenty of it.

2416. You cannot give us anything more definite than you have given?—No, it must be judged by all the circumstances of the case. If the Committee or the House of Commons were to rely on a special definition they would be beaten by some community who would go out of the definition to-morrow.

2417. Upon the point of the name, which is the only other circumstances you mentioned; you know, do you not, that letters have been published stating that the name of Anthony was taken by Father Hutchison upon confirmation?—No.

2418. You do not know the letters of Father Dalgairns and others?—I do not remember.

2419. Let me read you a published letter from Father Dalgairns in the year 1864, "It is the custom among Catholics to take, if they please, a new name at confirmation in addition to that which they had received in baptism. These confirmation names, in the case of converts, would be unknown or seem strange to their Protestant relatives, and yet they might happen to be the names by which they were best known to each other as members of the community. This was actually the case with Mr. Smee's brother in-law. He was always called among ourselves by the name of Anthony, his confirmation name, and he even used frequently to add it to his signature, whereas Mr. Smee only knew him by his baptismal name, William. On his tombstone he is described by both names, and his death is similarly registered." Did you not read that letter at the time it was published in the "Morning Post" of the 10th March 1864?—I will not undertake to say whether I did or not.

2420. My having read it to you would be enough to call it to your mind, would it not?—I have read another statement of his; whether that is the same as a separate pamphlet, I do not know.

2421. Have you not seen that statement in print under the signature of fathers of the Oratory?—I do not remember to have seen it.

2422. Mr. Sherlock.] There were a great number of witnesses examined upon this occasion before Lord Penzance, were they not?—A good many.

2423. You felt a good deal of confidence, I presume, in the plans which you put in on this matter?—I felt very little, because I could not get at the facts. How could we get inside a sealed building?

2424. Did you believe your pleas to be true?—I had not the remotest doubt they were true, and would have appealed again but for the great expense.

2425. Do you believe that your relative was of unsound mind at the time when he made his will?—I have stated distinctly that he was of impaired mind, but not insane. The difference that I, as a doctor, draw between insanity and impairment of mind is what you must place reliance on.

2426. Were you of opinion that he was so unsound of mind as to be incapable of making a will?—I am of opinion that he was in that state of mind which rendered him impressionable and emotional, and capable of being acted upon, and therefore incapable of making a will at that moment.

2427. And if Lord Penzance had believed your evidence he would have thought him incapable of making a will?—I do not know that. I think he went upon insanity and upon insanity alone, and it struck me that that was a very wrong legal view to take of it.

2428. Then do you think that the evidence which you gave on that occasion was sufficient to invalidate the will if your evidence had been believed?—No, I do not think that the evidence as it stood was sufficient. Whilst persons are in a house of the description of the Oratory, you cannot get at the facts.

2429. Did you not attend him at the time of his death?—I attended him immediately before his death, within a few days.

2430. In 1863, three years after making the will?—Three years after making the will.

2431. You are a medical man yourself?—I am.

2432. You swore to the fact of his having paralysis?—Of his having paralysis and organic disease of the brain. That was the impression of everybody who saw him.

2433. Whose impression was it, besides your own?—I think every one of the medical witnesses.

28 June 1870.

2434. That his brain was so disordered as to be incapable of understanding?—No, that is not the question, but whether he had organic disease of the brain or not.

2435. On that subject, may I ask whether these were not the observations of Lord Penzance: "The case set up against the will is, that the testator had for years been affected with a nervous complaint, which impaired his mind"; that was the case which you set up?—No, we did not set up that case at all.

2436. Then Lord Penzance mistook the case that you set up?—I think he did; no doubt about that medically.

2437. Then he said, "That it had impaired some of his bodily functions is plain from the evidence on both sides; but had it impaired his mind? Upon such a question the court naturally looks to the positive evidence on the one side and on the other, as to his acts, and speech, and writings while under the influence of the disease, and in the face of evidence of that character, suggestions even of the highest scientific men that possibly his mind might be affected would have very little weight; the very eminent gentlemen who were called on the part of the defendant;" that is the medical witnesses whom you examined on your behalf?—They did not see him.

2438. "At once said, with that candour and honesty of purpose which distinguishes their profession, that they could not undertake to say that his mind was impaired;" now is it not the fact, that the medical witnesses whom you examined would not undertake to say that his mind was impaired?—Certainly.

2439. But you did undertake to say that his mind was impaired?—Impaired in that sense; weakened. I meant impaired by weakness.

2440. Is not that impaired?—You might put it in another sense, and take it to mean an insane impairment.

2441. Did you not swear that his mind was impaired, with a view to support your plea that he was not of sound mind, memory, and understanding?—If you suggest that I swore that improperly, I say I swore what was true.

2442. But the judge and you differed in opinion as to the veracity of your statement?—Not a bit of it; he simply stated that that view that I took of his mind being impressionable and weakened was not a case of insanity in law.

2443. That was not the decision of the judge?—That was the interpretation of the view that was taken, and not in the way that you are suggesting it.

2444. I will read you now the words again: "That it had impaired some of his bodily functions is plain from the evidence on both sides; but had it impaired his mind? Upon such a question the court naturally looks to the positive evidence on the one side and on the other, as to his acts, and speech, and writings while under the influence of the disease, and in the face of evidence of that character, suggestions even of the highest scientific men that possibly his mind might be affected would have very little weight;" is not the inference from that as plain as possible that Lord Penzance was of opinion that his mind was not affected?—No; you read the end of it, and never began with the beginning. What was it that did not impair his mind? Disease of the brain; and in putting disease of the brain in that way, what he stated was right.

2445. Does not Lord Penzance go on in his judgment to show the mental labour of the testator up to the time of his death, or nearly so, and many years after the time of making the will; does he not say, "They all agree that he was suffering from nervous disease, from partial paralysis of a portion of the nerves, arising from tumour or some other injury at the base of the brain; that the nervous disease increased and finally caused his death, but that it was a species of nervous disease which might exist without affecting the brain, and that they saw not the slightest trace of any affection of the mind;" is not that the judgment of the learned judge, Lord Penzance, that there was not the slightest trace of any affection of the mind?—That is his judgment; that is what we should have appealed upon but for the cost.

2446. Then you think he was wrong?—We should have appealed against it but for the expense.

2447. Possibly Lord Penzance may have been wrong, but he thought you were wrong?—Precisely; and there is a Court of Appeal if we think that judges are wrong.

2448. Then Lord Penzance being of opinion that the paralysis had not affected his brain, and you being of opinion, and having sworn that it had weakened his intellect, there was a very material difference of opinion between the court and the witness?—Yes; and that is what we should have appealed against.

2449. Your counsel, Dr. Deane, stated your case from your instructions?—From my solicitor's instructions.

2450. And your solicitor took the instructions from Mr. Smee?—And the other evidence.

2451. And you instructed your counsel to state this in reference to the capacity of the testator: "The testator's capacity having been blunted by paralysis, the next inquiry is how far undue influence had been exercised upon him;" your case was, and your counsel on your behalf and in your presence stated, that his intellect was blunted by paralysis?—Yes.

2452. The judge did not think so?—He did not decide so.

2453. Did not the whole of his judgment, I ask you as an intelligent medical gentleman, negative such a supposition?—The whole of his judgment clearly negatived mental disease, but he threw over everything like the consideration of what I call a mind weakened from disease. In medical testimony of this sort, the difference is between direct insanity and a person who is weak and impressionable in mind.

2454. The judge went on to say, "It is fully established that he retained his mental faculties up to the hour of his death?"—Yes.

2455. If a man's mind is weakened does he retain his mental faculties according to your view?—In that sense. The whole of those observations go to this, that he was not insane; and I swore distinctly upon the trial that to my judgment there was no insane idea.

2456. Yet you swore that his mind was blunted and that his mind was weakened?—And I swear that now.

2457. There were witnesses examined, both the gentlemen who prepared the will and the witnesses to it; the Rev. George Frederick Ballard appears to have been examined; were you present at that examination?—Yes.

2458. Did he swear upon that occasion as follows:

follows: "The Oratory is a society of secular priests living in community. It is one of the few religious orders in which no vows are taken beyond those of the priesthood. There is no distinct vows of poverty or obedience, and the members can withdraw from the community at their pleasure. We all contribute a small annual sum by way of commons; with that exception we have the perfect control of our own property;" you heard that gentleman examined?—Yes, I did.

2459. And you heard him cross-examined?—I did.

2460. And you did not hear that portion of his examination questioned upon cross-examination?—I heard that, and moreover I consulted my solicitor afterwards whether, with all the facts before us, he should not be indicted for perjury.

2461. That was your view?—That was my view of the case.

2462. There was another gentleman examined, the Rev. Mr. Knox was himself examined; did you hear his evidence?—Yes.

2463. He was left a legacy of 30*l.*?—Yes.

2464. And subject to that the entire of the property was left to the other legatees; is that so?—To Dr. Faber.

2465. Is not the fact of a small legacy being left to an individual member of this congregation evidence to show that he was meant to have a personal and individual enjoyment of that small sum of 30*l.*?—No, I think that it was left as a mere blind to conceal the character of the transaction.

2466. That is your belief?—That is my belief.

2467. Mr. Newdegate.] If you are right that would not disturb the enjoyment of the 30*l.* to Mr. Knox; the devise of the 30*l.* to Mr. Knox would still be valid?—If the will was upset the will would have been gone.

2468. You do not mean that the legacy of 30*l.* was not valid; Mr. Knox would take the 30*l.* under the will?—Yes.

2469. Mr. Sherlock.] On the face of the will is there not this: "I give and bequeath to the Reverend Thomas Knox, of the Oratory aforesaid, the sum of 30*l.*?—Yes.

2470. You think that that is a blind?—Yes.

2471. Have you any reason, except your own suspicion, to think so?—From the whole case; all the circumstances.

2472. You wrote to Sir George Grey, I think, in regard to that matter referred to by Mr. Newdegate?—I wrote to him about the graveyard business.

2473. And you were cross-examined in regard to that on the trial by Mr. Karslake; the letter which you wrote to Sir George Grey contained this, "The death of my relative was advertised with the falsified addition of 'Anthony,' so that his friends do not know who is dead"?—I do not think that that is the exact wording.

2474. "The death of my relative was advertised with the falsified addition of the word 'Anthony' to his name, so that his friends do not know who is dead," did not you write that letter on the 20th of July 1863?—If it is in the Parliamentary Paper containing the correspondence, it is so.

2475. And you there stated to Sir George Grey that "his friends do not know who is dead"?—Yes; how can they tell?

2476. You had attended his funeral?—I had attended his funeral.

2477. You had been attending him during his illness?—I had been attending him part of the time.

2478. You knew that he was dead?—Yes.

2479. Your wife, his sister, knew it also?—Yes.

2480. Are you aware of any other relative that was deceived?—I never said a word about "relatives;" I said "friends."

2481. "So that his friends do not know who is dead"?—How could they know if it is a wrong name. It was another person.

2482. That was the fair meaning of your letter?—That was the fair meaning of it; it is another name, another individual.

2483. You have not found anyone yet, I suppose, to advance you the money for going on with this appeal in Chancery?—No; will you? I will begin to-day if you will; your family are interested more than mine.

2484. Mr. Cogan.] We have passed a very interesting day in hearing all about this matter; but on the whole of the evidence that you have given, does it not simply come to this, that you impeach this will on the ground of the incapacity of the testator, and because the will was obtained by undue influence, and that the judge differed with you in both those respects, and declared the will to be valid and good?—Yes.

2485. Did you raise any other objection to the will?—I read three pleas.

2486. That third plea was a formal plea, and it was decided against you?—Yes.

2487. Then you simply come here now to try and defeat the decision of the judge?—No, I am come to give the Committee information.

2488. You appear here as the defeated party in a lawsuit, and naturally very much discontented with the decision of the judge; is not that so?—No, I come here to give you evidence; I am a defeated party, but I do not come here as a defeated party to complain. I come here to give you evidence of the amount of property that these monastic institutions have.

2489. The fact is, that you were defeated in that lawsuit, and are, very naturally, discontented; did you make an objection to this bequest, that it was void in law, as being made to a member of a community which was illegal?—That plea could not be put in that court. This is strictly legal, and I am not a lawyer and competent to argue the question; but, as I understand it, that question can only be tried in Chancery.

2490. But you did not try that question in Chancery?—That question has not been tried in Chancery, on account of the expense of it; it may be now, for all I know; I believe that the time is not closed yet.

2491. Sir John Ogilvy.] I wish to recall your attention to the real purpose for which you have been examined; that purpose is to show to this Committee that the congregation or the community of the Oratorians is of a conventual or a monastic character; what are the proofs that you have to submit to us in support of that?—The proofs are upon the whole circumstances of the case. I have given you one proof, their community of property, that my relative would not part even to his sister with one small piece of plate for money or otherwise, saying that it belonged to the congregation; that he left his money to another part of the congregation apparently for common use. He left his money in a former will to the Earl of Arundel and Surrey, no doubt in trust, bearing all the primâ facie appearances of trust. Then, moreover, he always admitted the monastic character of the Oratory, and he wore the monastic dress, and lived away, and would never, as other priests do, come and stay, for instance, with a relative, and when he did come he was always obliged to be back by a certain time, and apparently was under the strict law of his superior. All the external circumstances show that he was really bound by the tightest possible vows, whatever the actual vows or rules were that were put forward.

2492. You have no further statement to make in support of the opinion you have expressed, that it is a convent or monastic institution?—No, not myself; but those different phrases used by the Duke of Norfolk with regard to that community all show the mode in which they conduct themselves generally, and show to my mind that it is of a perfectly monastic character. I entertain no more doubt of its being of a monastic character than any other monastery that I have lately seen at Florence, or Rome, or anywhere else.

2493. Chairman.] You say that your relative once told his sister that he could not give her a piece of plate because it belonged to the community?—Yes.

2494. Is his sister alive?—Yes, she is my wife.

2495. When was that?—I cannot fix the date. I know that she begged very hard indeed for a bit of the family plate.

2496. Was that many years before he died?—Yes; it was, I think, before he went to Syria, and that was before he made his last will, in 1860.

2497. Were you present when he said that?—Yes.

2498. Where was it?—In Finsbury-circus, at my own house; he used to visit us occasionally.

2499. Had he any peculiar dress on when he came on that occasion?—I think not; I think it was after he had left off his peculiar dress. I have no doubt that I could get from my people at home an exact description of the dress; they take more notice of those things than I do.

2500. Mr. Newdegate.] You have stated that you have been a good deal in Italy, and have seen a good deal of monasteries and convents there?—Yes, I used to see them when I was there.

2501. Now I wish to ask you whether this statement, which is made by Mr. Algernon Taylor (who was for two years in Italy, and resident in several convents and monasteries, and who gives a list of 64 that he visited), in his work on "Convent Life in Italy," tallies with your experience; he says: "The Oratorians are a congregation of secular priests, instituted by San Philip Neri, in the 16th century; they are called secular priests because, notwithstanding that they live in community, and according to monastic rule, they do not take perpetual vows, and may, accordingly, leave their convents if they wish, although I believe this privilege is seldom exercised. The Oratorians of San Philippo have a handsome, and apparently a well-endowed convent:" he adds in a note, "monks and friars who live in monasteries, according to given rule (Latin regula), are called regular clergy, while parish priests and their curates are called secular clergy;" now do these statements made by Mr. Taylor concur with your impressions as to this order?—They do concur with my impressions, but I cannot answer the question with regard to Italy absolutely.

2502. You have stated something with respect to your relative having worn a monastic dress; now I find that Mr. Samuel Phillips Day, who wrote upon monastic institutions in 1855, states this, on page 72 of his work: "The institute of St. Philip was established in London some few years ago by Father Newman, Faber, and one or two other Oxford clergymen who had embraced the Roman form of Christianity; at the time the Oratorians occasioned a good deal of comment, and even merriment, for it was rather a novel sight in England, but especially in the metropolis, to observe the fathers and brothers in their long monkish soutanes and broad-brimmed hats and boy-like turned-down collars, parading the principal streets, looking like the ghosts of past ages in the sunlight of our civilisation; several congregations of the order have now been formed, of which the principal are in London and in Birmingham"; does that agree with what you saw?—Yes, that is perfectly true: it was a distinct monastic dress; there is no question about the monastic dress.

The Right Honourable CHARLES HUGH, Baron CLIFFORD of Chudleigh, attending by permission of the House of Peers; Examined.

Baron Clifford of Chudleigh.

2503. Chairman.] YOU are cognisant, are you not, of the nature of our inquiry in this Committe?—Generally, I am.

2504. You are also aware of the state of the law affecting monastic institutions?—Yes.

2505. Are you prepared to state to the Committee the opinion of the Roman Catholic laity as to the effect and influence of those laws?—I was requested by a sub-committee, appointed by a large meeting of Catholics which met about two months ago, to appear before this Committee and state generally what the feelings of the laity were, with respect to the difficulties which those laws impose upon us. First, with regard to the laws affecting monastic orders previous to the French Revolution all our children were educated abroad, and necessarily so. After the French Revolution, when the monastic orders came over to England, since that period they have uniformly been educated in England; and we object that it is very prejudicial to general policy, and particularly to Catholics, that we are obliged to send our children for education, or generally to send our children, to be educated by men who are labouring under penal disabilities, and who may be dismissed from the country, such as Jesuits, and other orders. This tends very much, or might tend very much, to foster feelings of inattention and disregard to the law, inasmuch as they are educated by masters, whom they look up to, but who are habitually, I may say, infringing the law; at least, are teaching under penalties and under prohibitions; and we consider that that is not a proper position towards the law of the land in which they ought to be placed under those circumstances. Also, although we are prohibited from leaving legacies or moneys to those bodies who are engaged in teaching, there are certain means by which, in many cases, we are enabled to maintain that method of teaching.

2506. Mr. O'Reilly.] In short, your evidence applies to the restrictions on monastic orders contained chiefly in the Catholic Emancipation Act?—Yes.

2507. With regard to another branch of the law which you are equally acquainted with, the Statute of Superstitious Uses, how is the action of the Statute felt by the Roman Catholic laity?—Very injuriously, both in the instance of making wills, especially codicils to wills, leaving money as we wish, and also to executors in distributing moneys afterwards; in the first place, we habitually, or almost every day, are in the habit of giving money upon the condition that masses should be said either for ourselves, or our friends or relatives. This we do every day during our lives undoubtedly, and yet we are not allowed by codicils to our wills to continue that practice; it is certainly prohibited, and it acts unjustly in another respect. Many persons live only upon the income of a certain sum of money, which they cannot touch during their lives, and which ceases with them, but which they might dispose of after death, or by will, and this they are not permitted to do; in fact, they cannot practice what they have been habitually doing all their lives. With regard to the position of executors or residuary legatees, it is very difficult indeed to know how to dispose of sums of money which are left to us, and which we know perfectly well are left for this purpose; but we cannot have instructions, as the bequests would be void, if we followed out written instructions disposing of the property; and in regard to both cases our wish would be that we should be placed in the same position exactly as our Protestant fellow-subjects, who are not tied in that manner.

2508. Chairman.] Are we to understand that when you take property in that way, you consider that it is upon trust?—Certainly, upon trust; but we have no means to guide us in the distribution of that trust.

2509. Mr. O'Reilly.] Am I right in understanding that what you wish is, that exceptional legislation against Roman Catholics, especially as confined to those two Statutes, should be removed, but not that they should be exempted in any way from any restriction which applies to all other Englishmen?—No, certainly not; we wish to be placed precisely on the same footing.

2510. You know, I presume, that both those laws are constantly evaded?—Constantly evaded.

2511. But, as I understand it, your position is, that while it is quite possible to evade them, you do not think it right and just as regards Catholics, or desirable as regards the State, that a law should exist which you believe in point of fact must be, as long as there are Roman Catholics in the the country, systematically evaded?—Most certainly; that our children are brought up by masters placed in the position of perpetually evading the law, or disregarding it.

2512. With regard to your means of knowing the opinions of the Roman Catholic laity in England, generally, upon this point, your family, I think, have been continuously English Catholics for some hundreds of years?—Yes; for a long period at all events; since the times of Charles the Second, continuously.

2513. You are well acquainted with the general opinion of the English laity?—I believe so.

2514. And also, as I understand, you are particularly able to speak to their opinions upon this point, in consequence of a large meeting of the laity that was held when the subject was discussed about two months ago?—Yes; the subcommittee requested several gentlemen to attend, but they are either absent from London, or unwell, and are unable to give evidence.

2515. Chairman.] Do we understand from what you say, that your amendment of the law would extend to repealing that penal clause in the Emancipation Act?—To repeal that penal clause, and also to do away with that law which has sprung up, partly perhaps from custom, and partly from the old Statutes, with regard to superstitious uses.

2516. But the effect of repealing the clause under the 10th of George the Fourth, would be to make those religious orders legal in their general character, and putting them upon the footing entirely of all other men who may live in community?—Yes; it would simply ignore them; it would put them upon the same footing as any other Protestant community which choose to live together.

2517. You are, of course, aware of the policy of the law in enacting that clause; do you state here any ground upon which that policy should now be changed?—It was generally understood at the time, as well as I recollect, that that clause was left in out of deference to a number of persons, particularly, I believe, in the Upper House, who would not have passed the Emancipation Act if that clause had not remained; and it was generally understood, I believe, that the Duke of Wellington conceded it in order to secure the passing of the Bill.

2518. Are you aware whether it has ever been enforced?—I believe never, or at least not to my knowledge.

2519. Is it part of your view then of the case, as you have stated it, that it is inoperative, although it is offensive?—Hitherto, I believe, it has been inoperative as far as the bodies themselves are concerned; but I object to the status in which our children at present receive their education from men who are under a certain slur and placed in an inferior position by the Legislature of the country, and who are perpetually disregarding a law made in respect to them, but which cannot be enforced.

2520. Practically, you know of no other inconvenience?—Not as regards the laity; I am not aware of any other.

2521. Are you aware that there has been a very great increase of late in England, of those about whom there is no question as to their belonging to certain orders, especially the Jesuits?—I do not know of late years; I believe that they have increased slightly since their arrival in the country; the colleges have increased in number, I think, and the number of young men sent to our colleges have increased certainly.

2522. But whether it is objectionable or not to evade the law, or at least to have a law hanging over them of that kind, practically they live in this country without the slightest fear of its enforcement?—I cannot say that they live without the slightest fear of its enforcement, for it may be enforced at any time, and the grievance exists; what I mean by the enforcement of the law is, that in fact they have a threat constantly hanging over their heads in terrorem and that reacting upon the students must have a prejudicial effect.

2523. Do you believe that the laws regarding the establishment of those orders, or the existence of those orders in this country, are peculiar to it, and that the same restrictions do not exist in some Catholic countries at present?—I do not think there are any restrictions. I think that, in some cases, there are prohibitions, but I am not aware of any restrictions. In some countries there are prohibitions, but I am not aware that when they are once admitted there are any restrictions, or that they are placed under any kind of control.

2524. For instance, are there not special laws in France affecting religious orders of men with respect to their holding property, and with respect to their government when associated together in any house?—I do not know: but that refers to the whole of the country. I do not think that there are exceptional laws with regard to particular houses; they are general laws for the whole of the country which would affect everyone equally.

2525. I allude to special laws affecting the religious orders?—I am not aware of any special laws; there were prohibitions, and there were special laws at one time against them, all of which have been removed. I believe they are on just the same footing as any other parish priest or priest in France.

2526. I am referring to the special law affecting the acquisition of property certainly, but generally affecting those religious orders in France?—I am not aware that there are. With regard to some vows, I have heard that they are made for a limited period; but that does not affect their property or their status.

2527. With respect to the acquisition of property, I presume that your particular objection to the law, as it stands now, is that any deed of gift or any bequest might be rendered void to a certain extent, that is to say, so far as it was to be applied to prayers for the dead, or what is termed in the Statute superstitious use; but do you extend that remark to the laws of mortmain, which prevent the acquisition of property in perpetuity by spiritual corporations?—The laws of mortmain, as I understand them (I speak with diffidence, not being a lawyer), refer to all the members of the community just as the present laws passed for the education of the members of different bodies affect all equally. I believe that that is the case at present as to the laws of mortmain, but we do not object, individually as Catholics, to the laws of mortmain.

2528. You approve of the policy of the law which prevents land becoming inalienable on being acquired by any corporation?—Generally, I do. I suppose that that is the general feeling of the country, and personally we do not object to the law; it refers to all persons equally, it is not a special law.

2529. Are you aware that that law is evaded, and being successful as an evasion it cannot be reached by the law with respect to mortmain, and that property is held now by religious houses as continuously, by means of joint tenancies, as it used to be in times when that was legal?—I am under the impression that it is generally by trust; the money is generally put into a trust; it is so in this case. Generally it is not left or given to bodies, it is given to particular trustees for a certain purpose.

2530. There seemed to be two ways in which property is acquired; it is acquired in the way that you point out by trustees being named, who are not immediately cognisant of the nature of the trust; but it is also acquired by conveying the property absolutely to individuals, as joint tenants, which joint tenancy is kept alive by carefully supplying the lives as they drop in. I presume that if that tended to all the evils which the Statute of Mortmain was intended to rectify, you disapprove of it?—In so far; but I do not disapprove of the Statute of Mortmain as a special Act. I might object to it as any Protestant or anyone else might object to it with regard to corporations; anybody that felt an interest in a favourite corporation might object on the same grounds.

2531. Will you make that a little more clear; what is your precise objection to land being conveyed to trustees who have an understanding that it is not for their personal use, but who have not any power over its application, but who have faith that it will be applied in the manner in which the donor intended. What is your objection practically to that system which prevails amongst Catholics now?—Probably the same. I do not know that there is any one particular objection, except so far as it is to a certain extent disregarding the law; but that is equally done by others.

2532. But has the person who has the legal estate any power of control over the application of that property?—I cannot undertake to go into the legal question, I am not sufficiently conversant with it.

2533. But is there any practical inconvenience now from such a state of law, that, supposing a trustee were to see any misapplication of that property, he could not come before a court of law?—He could not come before a court to rectify it; he would have no standing before a court.

2534. And we understand that your view is that a conveyance, if it is shown to be a trust for a purpose not recognised by law, would be a void gift or bequest altogether?—Yes, but that would apply to others besides Catholics, and therefore we do not object to the law of mortmain on that ground, because it applies to all; it would not touch us individually as Catholics.

2535. I think that mortmain is one thing and superstitious use is another; if a gift was avowedly for a superstitious use, if you went to the court to cause a proper application of that trust, it would not be supported in the court, and the deed would be so far void for the purpose to which it was made?—Practically mortmain is not the same as superstitious uses; the grievance we feel is generally with regard to testamentary documents; it is not so much with regard to the disposition of property during life, but as regards legacies.

2536. Still the trustee would have no control over that property?—No, certainly not.

2537. Supposing that the intention of the testator was not avowed, but some persons were aware of what those intentions were; supposing that you were fixed upon yourself as a trustee without any immediate intimation as to the purpose to which it was to be applied, although knowing perfectly that it was some religious purpose which the testator had in view; could you inform the Committee who would have the administration of that fund?—I suppose it would lapse to the heir-at-law; but if the money was paid over upon the faith of a secret trust, such secret understanding would be carried out by any Catholic who was a trustee; but he would have no legal means of obtaining the property.

2538. But does it not occur that the trustees and the person who is cognisant of the intentions of the testator are not the same person?—Yes.

2539. And that as the person who is aware of the purpose the donor had in view, is independent of the legal trustee, the latter has no control over the property?—If he could prove that the trustee knew what the intentions of the testator were, no doubt that would void the trust.

2540. It is not in the discretion of the same person to apply this property, and there is no redress in case he should misapply it according to the view of any person taking a different view as to the intention of the testator?—None at all.

2541. Would you say that that was an inconvenience now operating in consequence of the law with respect to the disposition of property for religious uses?—Yes, with regard to the distribution of property, but still more so with regard to bequest by will.

2542. But it is a difficulty with respect to which, under the present state of the law, you cannot seek the protection of the court?—We cannot go to the court and ask for any advice as to the distribution of such property.

2543. I think I understand you to say that all that you require is to be put upon exactly the footing of other religious bodies in this country with respect to the acquisition and disposition of property?—Yes, precisely so.

2544. Mr. Jessel.] Do I understand you to say this, that the children that are sent to those Roman Catholic colleges are aware that their teachers are under the hand of the law?—Most certainly they are.

2545. Then of course that does very seriously interfere with their respect for the law in general?—Yes, it does; I do not say that it interferes at all with their loyalty, or with their feeling of attachment to the law; but that is owing to the teaching of those professors and not to the action of the law, as it at present stands; the tendency of the law as it at present stands is rather to teach them to disregard and evade the law.

2546. What I understand you to think is this, that children seeing that their teachers themselves habitually disregard the law are not likely to have the same respect for the law as they would have if their teachers were protected by the law, and did not disregard it?—The tendency no doubt is to diminish their respect for the law.

2547. Mr. Newdegate.] You stated, I think, that your family had been Catholics for 800 years?—No, I said that they had been so since the time of Charles the Second.

2548. I know that your Lordship's experience with regard to the tenure of property in this country is greater than some of us have had; but, I think, you have said that you are not aware of any restrictions upon the establishment of those religious orders in France?—I am not.

Baron Clifford of Chudleigh.

2549. Perhaps you have not recently looked through the French Code?—I do not profess to be well acquainted with the state of the French Catholics.

2550. Are you aware that a contest has been going on between the Government of France and the officers of the Papacy, with respect to the jurisdiction of the French archbishops and bishops over those regular orders?—No; but I am not aware how that would affect their position or status; it might occur in any community where they are tolerated.

2551. You have not seen the letter from, and signed by, his reverence the Pope, which was produced by Monsieur Ollivier, the prime minister of France, in which the Pope claimed a separate jurisdiction over the religious orders generally, but particularly the Jesuits and the Franciscans?—No, I have not seen it.

2552. Then you are not aware that that letter was held to violate the concordat, which is in accordance with the fundamental statutes of the French empire?—The concordat is still existing; but that is effected by the laws of the empire; it applies to the whole of France.

2553. Are you aware that the Archbishop of Paris, in the French senate, declared that the fundamental statutes of the empire were in opposition, in fact, to the requirements of the Holy See?—I really have not entered into the question; I came here to state what affects us in England, as Catholic laymen.

2554. I put that question in consequence of your allusion to the laws of foreign countries; and I conclude that you have not studied the laws of France in particular relation to this subject?—Certainly not.

2555. You complain of the present restrictions under the clauses of the Act of 1869, against the erection and transfer of religious houses of the male orders and the restrictions against the Jesuists, and you also complain of the law against superstitious uses; supposing those laws were repealed, would it be possible to place the Roman Catholic body in the same position as other religionists?—I presume it would.

2566. But would they practically be in the same position as any other religious body in this country?—Certainly, I presume so.

2557. I am speaking, not of their being in the same position as any other religious body, so far as the laws of this country are concerned; but supposing the laws of this country, to which you object, were repealed, would the Roman Catholic body then be practically in the same position as any other religious denomination?—Yes, in this country the same as any other religious denomination.

2558. Do you conceive that they are not affected by the term of the brief of 1850, which is in fact a code?—I do not see that they are affected in any different way to others; more than the laws of any particular society in England or club would affect the members individually.

2559. Are you not aware that in this book, the Roman Catholic Directory, in consequence of that brief, there was an entire alteration in the mode of entry throughout England and Wales, and all items which refer to bishops or to priests or to convents of women, that there is an entire alteration in the form of that Directory in consequence of the brief of 1850?—Yes; I imagine it would be the same as any club or any voluntary body might make or arrange its own rules or regulations; it affects only ourselves with regard to our own internal organisation.

2560. But that internal organisation is declared, at all events, by the authority of the Holy See?—Yes, very possibly; but it has nothing to do with the laws of this country, it merely refers to ourselves, it does not alter our position with regard to the law of the land.

2561. May it not be necessary that the nation through its laws, as is the case with the French nation, whatever the form of government may be, should have some reference to the relation which you claim to sustain as religionists with the Holy See?—I can only state that the country for nearly the last 200 years has been passing these laws, and has now repealed almost every one as being utterly futile and unjust, except the few fragments which still remain, and which we have tried over and over again to get repealed.

2562. But, as a Roman Catholic, are you not aware that there are Statutes still upon record, passed centuries before the Reformation, in restraint of those organisations?—Yes, and I believe them to be equally futile; they may have served a temporary purpose, but there are the same religious orders now that there were then.

2563. Those laws were in restraint of their acquisition of property in this country, and in restraint of the influence that they claim to exercise?—No doubt, and I believe the greater part of them are repealed, except such as are embodied in the Statute of Mortmain.

2564. Are you aware that there is a relation between the Statutes against superstitious uses, as they are called, that is to say, the devotion of property to payment for prayers for the dead and the law of mortmain?—I believe that the law of mortmain is a Statute, and that the greater part of the superstitious uses is merely decisions of the courts of common law, and they are quite different. The one affects land, and the other has grown up very much by custom and the decisions of the courts. I believe the law against bequests for superstitions was commenced in Edward the Sixth's time, and since then it has been developed by the decisions of the courts, but it is on quite a different footing from that of mortmain, as I have understood it.

2665. But are you aware that the operation of the law against the devotion of property to prayers for the dead and the law of mortmain operate in the same direction; that is to say, to prevent the perpetual alienation of property to those purposes?—No, I should say not, certainly. The law against the devotion of property to prayers for the dead chiefly affects bequests, and the other affects the permanent settlement of land, and I understand the two to be totally distinct.

2566. Are you aware that in the olden time many of the Oratories were suppressed, because it was determined by Parliament, that whereas the dead die once the living may pray for them for ever, and that therefore the property became locked up in mortmain specially for that purpose?—I presume that any gift in perpetuum would not be recognised by law, but the law as against perpetuity is a general law which affects everybody. I imagine that the law of the land, would be practically sufficient for all purposes, and nd would apply to all parties, Catholic as well s Protestant.

2567. And it is not peculiar to this country? —I believe not, so far as my information goes.

2568. Then in objecting to the restraint of the aw which you have mentioned, you do not so ar impugn the policy of our ancestors, as to say hat there should be no restriction?—I really ave nothing to do with the policy of our ncestors; what I complain of is, that we are now xceptionally in a different position from the rest f our countrymen. Whatever the general laws of he country are, we are quite content to abide by.

2569. But are you not claiming to be in an xceptional position as Roman Catholics?— Certainly not.

2570. But do you not claim before the world o be in an exceptional position; for instance, a osition different from the members of the Church f England?—Certainly not.

2571. Supposing that there was no special osition with respect to the Roman Catholic hurch or community, and that there was nothing ut a general law applicable to all religious com- munities alike, would the Roman Catholic com- munity then practically be, not as regards the law f England only, but practically for all purposes, n the same position as other bodies?—I can only speak at present as to the law of England; and n that respect we certainly should be on an equality, and we should not complain.

2572. But looking at the proposed change in the law of England, and the question supposes that change effected, if that change were effected would the position of the Roman Catholic body in this country be really analogous to the position of any other religious community in it?—I am not prepared to answer that question, because there may be other laws besides those two par- ticular ones, superstitious uses and penalties upon religious orders, which we are inquiring into. I am no lawyer, and I cannot undertake to answer such a question as that.

2573. The question does not relate to the law of England; your Lordship has made a sugges- tion, that suggestion being that there should be no distinction recognised or enforced by the law of England with respect to any portion of the Roman Catholic denomination, different from the law as applicable to other denominations; that was your Lordship's proposal?—Yes.

2574. I understand your Lordship to believe, that if that proposal became law, the position of the Roman Catholic denomination, if you please so to term it, in this country would practically be the same as that of any other denomination? —As far as the law is concerned, and our relation to the laws.

2575. The question does not relate to the law of England; my question relates to the posi- tion of the Roman Catholic community, if you will allow me so to call it, which is known to be different in every country in the world, and is so recognised by the laws of France; and I ask you whether, if no recognition of that dif- ference existed in the law of England, or by the law of England, the position of the Roman Catholic community in this country would prac- tically and really be the same as that of any other denomination whatever?—To such an ex- treme question as that I can only say that the question which we are now discussing is the position which we should hold in the eye of the law in England.

2576. Mr. Pease.] I understand your com- plaint is that a Roman Catholic leaving pr perty, real or personal, for charitable purposes, may do so; but coupling with it the condition of prayers for his soul, he is obliged to leave it to others without specific trusts?—At present that is the case.

2577. It is simply left to others upon honour? —Upon honour.

2578. And in case of any mal-appropriation of the implied trust, there is no redress in the courts of this country?—Not the least; he has no standing in the court.

2579. And you think that is not a position which, as an Englishman enjoying religious free- dom, you ought to be placed in?—I think we ought to have a standing before the Courts, similar to what every other Englishman has.

2580. Do you think that none of those which are termed superstitious uses by Act of Parlia- ment, or by the decision of the courts, come within the line on which the State is bound to step in and say, that those applications of pro- perty are inimical to the safety of the State, or inimical to morality?—I think if they are against morality, the existing law is amply sufficient to restrain them; I do not say that there are any such cases.

2581. Mr. Chambers.] You complain that there is some disadvantage, as there obviously is, in the instructors of your children being under penal disabilities, and that being known to the children and young people; you are aware, of course, that the Jesuits are not put under penal disabilities because they instruct your children, but that being under penal disabilities you select them as their instructors?—Precisely.

2582. Is there any reason why Roman Ca- tholics should select persons for the instruction of their children who are under penal disabilities rather than have those who are freed from them? —Yes, because that order is particularly devoted to education.

2583. I should suppose that other Roman Catholics would learn Latin and Greek, and teach them as well as the Jesuits?—But, gene- rally speaking, the religious orders devote them- selves more exclusively to teaching; they have no parochial duties; they have more time, and their training is particularly adapted for the education of youth, both amongst the Jesuits and amongst the Benedictines and other orders, and on that ground they are more frequently selected.

2584. There would be no practical difficulty, I presume, in getting teachers enough for all the children of the Roman Catholic gentry without having recourse to those who happen to be under the ban of the English law?—No, certainly not; but I think the majority of those who teach are under a ban in their position, and, practically experience shows that it is so.

2585. The law has not, in point of fact, im- posed any disability upon them, because they are the instructors of young Roman Catholics; but being under a disability they have been selected to teach, and you still, notwithstanding that, think that the law ought to be altered, and the disability ought to be removed on that ground? —On that ground, because those orders are par- ticularly devoted to education in the Catholic church.

absolute gift over to A. B., without any evidence of any trust whatever, does not a Roman Catholic stand in the same relation as anybody else?—No, certainly not; an executor generally has some instructions as to how he is to dispose of the property, whereas a Catholic executor or trustee has none at all; if it happened that the executor of a will was not a Catholic, or had no sympathy with the Catholic religion, those implied trusts or bequests would most probably be entirely ignored.

2587. But if any large gift of money or land was left to A. B., with no indication whatever in the terms of the instrument or will that there is any trust at all, does not every devisee or legatee in that case stand precisely on the same footing before the law?—No, certainly not; because every Catholic knows practically that such-and-such a sum comes into his hands as trustee, or legatee, or residuary legatee, for what the law calls superstitious purposes, and he has no guidance as to the distribution of the money.

2588. Surely that would be a question of evidence, and if there is no indication of it in the instrument under which the property passes, there is no distinction at all as regards the religion of the testator or legatee in their coming before the courts; it is a mere question of evidence whether there be any trust at all?—If I appended a codicil to my will leaving a sum of money for masses, my intentions would assuredly be set aside.

2589. No doubt; but I am speaking of a case where there is no declared trust, and the question I put is whether, where there is an absolute gift of land or money, you, as a Roman Catholic, are at a disadvantage. I cannot see the distinction; if there be no declared trust all parties stand precisely in the same situation before the courts; it is a question of evidence, if you go into evidence, to show that there is a trust, then that trust may be set aside on the ground of a superstitious use, but so long as there is no declared trust at all, all parties are upon the same footing?—Yes, but a Protestant can declare his trust which a Catholic cannot.

2590. That leads me to another question; are you of opinion that there should be no restriction whatever upon the application of property to religious uses, whatever those uses may be?—Provided they are moral uses, such as are admitted by the general law of the State; of course there may be a trust for an immoral purpose, or one which is practically prejudicial to the State; but we think that the leaving of money for masses does not affect the State in any way at all.

2591. At all events, you consider that it would not fall within the category of objectionable uses?—No, certainly not.

2593. Chairman.] In the Emancipation Act, in that clause which has been referred to, there is a provision that any persons who are objected to in the former part of the clause, might, upon application to the Secretary of State, obtain a license to dwell in this country?—There was a register set up at the time of the Catholic Emancipation Act, but I believe that there are none now existing who would come within that regulation.

2594. But there is no authority under which Jesuits or people of the regular orders can legally dwell in this country?—No, certainly not; after the extinction of those who existed at the time of the emancipation, it was understood that no others were to be admitted.

The Reverend William Thomas Gordon, called in; and Examined.

2596. You have been called to state the nature of your community, and especially with the view to our ascertaining how far it comes under our order of reference, which, therefore, I will read to you; the first part of the order of reference is to inquire into the property of institutions or of the members thereof, of conventual or monastic institutions or societies; but there is a second part of our order of reference which is more particularly applicable to this case, and that is the part which gives us the power of inquiring into the case of religious institutions of a conventual or monastic character; will you state as briefly and as clearly to the Committee as you can what is the nature of your community, so as to enable them to judge how far it comes within the reference?—Expecting to have to answer this question I thought it best to prepare in writing a precise statement of what I consider to be the character of our congregation; but before I read this I would beg leave to make a few preliminary observations upon the evidence which was given on Tuesday last, to show that we are called frequently a community of men; that I should at once admit. I do not wish to dispute that we are a community of men any more than that we are men; but as all men are not monks, so all communities of men are not necessarily monastic. Certain ground at Sydenham was spoken of as the property of those men. Again, I do not deny, and I should not wish to deny, that there is property at Sydenham which belongs to this community of men, only I do not think that if a body of men possess certain property as a body that proves that they are monks, because colleges and clubs are in a precisely similar position. Then, again, I should like to mention that all monks are not necessarily priests; there are very large congregations of monks, very few of whom are priests; but at the same time all secular priests have something about them which makes them similar to a monk; they are separated more or less from the world; they are all celibates; they are bound to recite their breviary, and in countries where it is allowed they wear an ecclesiastical habit; and, therefore, an association of secular priests, who might band themselves together for the purpose of carrying arrying out their work as secular priests if hey thought it better, would have more the ook of a monastic institution than an association f laymen; but unless they have some rule or ome characteristic which would make laymen nonks, they would not be any more monks than would laymen in a similar position. Every secular riest is not a monk, and therefore 10 secular riests, unless they cease to be secular priests, do ot become monastic by living together; I only wanted to mention that first.

2597. Chairman.] I understand you that a nonk is not necessarily a priest?—Not necessarily a priest. A secular priest has certain things which makes him look like a monk, because he is separated from the world and wears a particular dress, and therefore, as I say, 10 secular priests living together, remaining secular priests, would have to outsiders, so to speak, the look of a monastic institution without being so the least in the world. I will now read this statement, and I am quite willing to give the fullest information upon any part of it: "The priests of the Oratory are an association of secular priests living together, but bound by no vows, oath, or promise of any sort. This association is not only not a monastic institution or a society of a similar character, but it is designedly so constituted as to be of a dissimilar character. Vows of poverty and obedience are essential to the idea of a monk or nun, whether they are for life or for a period of years, or only annual; but the priests of the Oratory not only, as a fact, take no such vows, but their constitutions expressly forbid their doing so, in order that they may remain strictly secular priests. To secure this moreover, it is provided (in Decretum XIV.), that even if the majority agree to take vows and to become religious, they by that act cease to be Oratorians, and must withdraw from the community. The members of the Oratory are perfectly free to leave without any dispensation, and each member retains the complete control over his private property both as to expenditure and disposal by will. He gives no account of it to any superior, and is only required to contribute a certain agreed sum to the common fund for his board and lodging while he continues a member. Each house of the Oratory is quite independent of and separate from every other house. In the instructions from the House of Commons to the Committee they are directed to inquire into certain questions respecting the property of monastic societies, and the members of such societies. This instruction evidently takes for granted that the property of the members of a monastic society is practically, because of their vow of poverty, the property of the society; but the priests of the Oratory not being a monastic society in any sense of the words, their private property is no more the property of the association than the property of a member of the Reform Club is the property of the club. To classify the Oratory as a monastic institution, would not only be inaccurate, but unjust, and would lead to many inconveniences. If another Committee were appointed to inquire into the property of colleges, seminaries, cathedral chapters, and ecclesiastical institutions of a non-monastic character, they would rightly consider that the Oratory came under their instructions. The first house of the Oratory was founded in Rome, by St. Philip Neri, 300 years ago. Since then, in many cities, similar associations of secular priests have been formed, taking that of St. Philip as their model, but having no connection one with the other. These associations are, therefore, well-known, and their character is an historical fact; and that this character is essentially non-monastic may be ascertained by consulting any work treating of such subjects; for example, Móroni's well-known Dictionary of Ecclesiastical History, vol. xxi., page 283, under the article "Filippini"; and, even in a popular work like Chambers's Encyclopædia, this character of the Oratorian communities is carefully stated; vide vol. vii., article "Oratory." The extract from Móroni is, "He (St. Philip) prescribed in the constitution that no vows of any kind should be made in the congregation, wishing that those who entered it should be bound only by charity (which means love in that case), and that if any desired to leave in order to embrace the religious state he should have full liberty so to act. Hence the priests of the Oratory are secular priests." And the extract from Chambers is, "The fathers of the congregation are a body of priests, living in community, but without vows, and under a constitution of a highly democratic character. They are at liberty to withdraw at any time, and, even during their association, each member manages his own financial concerns, only contributing a fixed sum to the common expenses of the community. Each house is distinct and independent."

2598. I want the Committee clearly to understand what is the exact position of the members of the Brompton Oratory; in the first place, am I right in saying that the association at Brompton has no connection, as regards property or control, with the members of any other community of the same sort in England?—Quite so.

2600. Then you do possess, as a community or association, as I understand it, a church and house and garden at Brompton, and a house, as we have it in the return, and some ground at Sydepham?—Yes.

2601. Which is held, am I right in saying, substantially very nearly as the property of a club might be, for the common purposes of the members residing there?—Yes, I believe that is as near a description as you could give of the way the property is held.

2602. And then, as I understand it, each member pays an annual subscription equivalent to the cost of his board and living towards the institution?—Yes.

2603. And further than that, he does exactly what he likes with all his property?—Exactly.

2604. As superior of the Oratory, have you any control over the property of any of the other members?—None whatever.

2605. Have you, as a matter of fact, a knowledge as to what at this moment is the property of each individual member of the Oratory?—I do not know; with regard to two or three I may know it as personal friends, but as to the majority I do not know how much they have got.

2606. With regard to some evidence which I think you heard given on the last day that you were here, it was stated by Mr. Smee that Father Hutchison, when he was a member of your community, had not the control of his own property; that he clearly understood from his relative, and drew the conclusion from the facts that he had no control over his own property, but that it was in fact the property of the community; could you give us any grounds besides your own assertion for thinking that that statement was inaccurate?—Yes, I can. First of all, it was certainly most inaccurate; I think the very trial to which Mr. Smee has so constantly alluded would prove it to be so; it was stated by Father Knox in his evidence, that Father Hutchison had given to the community the sum of 7,000 l. towards building the house of the Oratory, but he stipulated that an annuity, amounting to the interest of that sum, should be paid to him during his lifetime; and Father Knox further stated, being on oath, that he knew that the annuity had been regularly paid to him up to the time of his death, which shows the relations of the Oratory to its members, that the members can make a present to the congregation, and stipulate that they shall have a certain income from it. Moreover, I have an extract from our book of resolutions, which I thought would bear upon this point. There were two resolutions; one was passed in December 1859, in these words: "To accept the offer of Father Antony Hutchison to carry out at his own expense the late plans for the library, subject to such alterations as shall seem good to the congregation of deputies," which would give you an idea of the relations in which they stand the one to the other. Just as a member of a club might offer to build a billiard room or a smoking room, and the club might accept it; so we accepted Father Hutchison's offer to do up the library, which he made, wishing to have a memorial of himself in the congregation, just the same as a person might give money to a memorial window in a church or a cathedral, or as a person might give money for a college library, in the same way. The same thing was done before, for I have this resolution: "Also it was resolved unanimously, to accept an offer of Fathers Hutchison and Wells to build a chapel of St. Philip in the bay next but one to the pulpit." We do, from time to time, if we like, make presents, and we are put down as benefactors, just as much as any stranger who would give a present to the congregation. Father Hutchison, as is well known to many of the Committee, was engaged in very large charitable works in Drury-lane, works which I believe are notorious throughout London, for the good that they did. One of them was a large ragged school, and an industrial school connected with it. In a report published after he had to give it up on account of his health, there is this passage; speaking of Father Hutchison: "Not only have his time and his health (in the hope of recruiting which he is at present abroad) been expended on the schools, but he has hitherto had to supply from his own private resources any deficiencies in the accounts." Unless you take the view as Mr. Smee did, that all those things were blinds, it is perfectly clear the relations in which we stand. Moreover, Father Hutchison was an intimate friend of mine, and I could tell the Committee very much how his money was got through. Unless you think that it is impossible that a man can get through his property without being under a vow of poverty, it is perfectly clear that Father Hutchison spent his money after his own free will. First of all, before he joined the Oratory, he had given over 1,000 l. to a church in Staffordshire, and then he gave 7,000 l., which was mentioned on the trial, in building the house of the Oratory; he fitted up our library, which cost more than 1,000 l; he gave something towards a chapel in the church, and the expenses which he underwent in carrying on the schools at Charles-street it would be impossible to calculate; he made up every year the deficiencies himself; and he was an excessively liberal person, and really gave open handed to everybody whom he came across; and, moreover, in that locality he came across the poorest of the poor. And I can state myself, without any effort of memory, two cases in which he gave 100 l., and in another 50 l. to a family in distress, out of his own money. In fact, he had provided for his own support by this annuity, and he spent his capital freely upon all the good works which he undertook, so that when he died his property was sworn under 5,000 l., and that included a reversion of 3,000 l., which had not come in before. He simply spent the whole of his property upon good works, having secured himself an annuity, in the expenditure of which he was perfectly free and uncontrolled as much as any charitable gentleman living alone in his own lodgings.

Rev. W. T. Gordon.

2607. A statement was made by the same witness that Father Hutchison had said that he could not give or sell some plate to his sister (it was hearsay evidence) with the family crest upon it, because it was the property of the community; could you, of your own knowledge, say anything with regard to the plate which was Father Hutchison's property?—If he did give any plate to the community, of course it would be a free gift, but my own belief is that he never did, because I know that before he joined the Oratory he had melted down a portion, I do not know that it was all, but certainly a portion of his family plate, for the purpose of having it converted into some church plate. As far as I know I have never seen in the congregation any plate used which belonged to Father Hutchison. My own belief is, that when he answered his sister, he said he could not give it to her, because it had been already melted down for the purpose of being converted into church plate.

2608. You are certain that he could not have answered that he could not give it away (if it was in his own possession) because it was the property of the community, because in that case it would have been his own property?—Quite certain.

2609. It was stated as one reason for believing Father Hutchison to be a monk, that he wore a religious habit as similar to those of monks; can you state that the habit is similar to that of secular priests in other countries, and not a monastic habit?—Yes, I can; in our constitution, drawn up for our guidance, and which we accept, it says that a style of dress is to be retained which becomes secular clerics, and at the time that the proclamation which was referred to last time was made, we discussed the question whether we could still continue to wear our cassocks about the streets as we did at that time, because we were not monastic; but we were told then by the lawyers whom we consulted, that the Act, whatever the Act was, referred equally to cassocks worn by secular priests, and therefore we could not do it.

2610. A statement was made that Father Hutchison could not visit his relatives or stay with them, because he was obliged, under obedience, to return to the community house; you you have stated that there is no vow of obedience; but are there restrictions by the rules as to going out or staying out, except the ordinary one which exists in all well-regulated houses of returning at a reasonable hour?—None, excepting that.

2611. And being present at times when their duties to the community are to be performed?—Yes; as a matter of fact, I think we all agree among ourselves not to dine out except under special circumstances; but we all do dine out at times with our relations. Of course, if we dined out frequently it would very much interfere with our work. With regard to the restraint of intercourse between Mr. Smee and his brother-in-law, there was a letter read at the trial, which I think would show the Committee the exact relations in which they stood, if I might read it. For 11 years Mr. Smee never called upon him; he said it was difficult to get into the house, and Father Hutchison writes to express surprise at his coming to see him, because for 11 years he had never been near him, and otherwise his conduct shows quite clearly that they were not on very friendly relations. So far from the Oratory being so constructed that persons could never enter it, I think it is more open than most houses in London are; but it is perfectly true that there are times when our servants have instructions to say "Not at home" to certain persons, as in any other house in London, and that, I suppose, was said to Mr. Smee.

2612. How can you account for the language of the draft will which was used, and the opinion of Mr. Bagshawe which was mentioned?—In this manner: the subject of the draft will was suggested by the lawyer; we had employed him to prevent the property which belonged to the club, so to speak, passing by will to a relation, which was not intended. Mr. Bagshawe's opinion was asked as to how it was possible to escape the danger of one of the fathers of the Oratory leaving his property to a relation, unintentionally giving that relation a claim upon the common property of the association. I think, if fairly gone into, it would rather prove that we could leave our property to our relations instead of only to other members.

2613. In point of fact, that suggestion of the lawyer was made in consequence of the fact that the fathers of the Oratory could and did leave their property to relations; and it was to provide for the case of inadvertency on the part of a father of the Oratory making a will, and leaving all the remainder of his property to those whom he wished to leave it to, to his relations or otherwise, and leaving that which he in fact was holding in trust, namely, the community or club property?—That is so.

2614. As I understand it, you do not consider that you are in any manner an order, and you do not in any way come under the penal clauses of the Emancipation Act against monks or other religious persons bound by vows?—I should say I am quite sure.

2615. Therefore you can claim no privilege or exemption from questions on that ground?—Not according to my present conviction.

2616. And you possess, every member of you, private property which you have inherited, or get as other members of the community get it, from friends or relations; and if this Committee decides on inquiring into the property of the members of your community, they must, in fact, examine every member of it to know what he inherited, how he inherited it, who he got it from by gift, and what he does with it, and they would, in fact, be examining into private matters just as much as if they were examining me as to my property?—Certainly, quite so.

2618. Would they have to subscribe to such rules?—The process is this. We have drawn up a copy of rules which are almost identical with those which were drawn up by a congregation of a similar nature at Rome shortly after St. Philip's death. We made a little alteration in them ourselves, and when a person wishes to join us, he is shown them in order to let him see the nature of our association. Then if he wants to come he is elected by ballot; but he signs nothing, and makes no sort of engagement, more than, of course, he understands what his object in coming to the association is, and we have to look at him to see if we think he would be a pleasant companion, and then he is elected by ballot.

2619. Chairman.] I believe those rules were produced at the trial that you refer to?—They were; there is a copy of them in the British Museum translated.

2620. What is the date of those rules?—That particular date, I think, is 1847. We have slightly modified the former rules which were drawn up after St. Philip's death, I suppose, at the beginning of the 17th century.

2621. But, substantially, they are the same?—Yes, substantially, they are the same.

2622. Wherever those communities exist, are they bound by similar rules?—If they choose; in this case, for instance, we slightly modified the rules for the sake of suiting ourselves better to England, as we thought.

2623. But not substantially affecting the original intention of the founder of this community?—No; it would not be allowed by the ecclesiastical authorities for a body of priests to call themselves priests of the Oratory who took different rules because of the confusion which would ensue. St. Philip did not found an order, as he states in his rule, and you find no provision at all for a congregation even existing in any other city. He merely formed an association in Rome, which has been taken as the model for other societies in other cities. It is a curious thing that each congregation springs up on its own basis, but it takes, as a matter of fact, the one in Rome for its model.

2624. Can you say whether it was a question whether property belonging to individual fathers should be considered as belonging to the community?—Yes.

2625. And did you recommend that it should not be?—Yes; some father urged it in writing, and St. Philip took the paper, and wrote "habent et possideant," shall have and possess.

2626. Practically, can you tell us whether the property belonging to any individual father ever is devised away from the community, or in any other way than for the benefit of the community?—Yes, there have been instances of its having been done so, although very few of us have as yet died.

2627. This community existed for some time before

4 July 1870.

before the name of Father of the Oratory was assumed, did it not?—No, that was a mistake; when Father Faber was converted, he had living with him some young men at Elton Rectory, and when he became a Catholic he kept those young men together, and intended to found a community of his own, and Father Hutchison originally joined him in that undertaking; they were called Wilfridians, and they had a house given them by Lord Shrewsbury at Alton, in Staffordshire; they did intend to become regular monks, and they hoped in course of time to be allowed to take vows, and Father Faber, who had been the founder, lived with them; but after living together for more than a year, they agreed to break up their community; but most of them joined the Oratory; they entered as any other members, as novices, and were received in as novices; and so that community of Wilfridians entirely passed away. There were simply some people who had intended to found an order, as it were, and certainly some of them joined the Oratory, but the Oratory had no sort of connection with the Wilfridians more than that, and Father Faber then abandoned the idea altogether.

2628. Do you allude to the year 1848, when this Oratory was founded?—Yes; Father Newman came over to England with a band of friends who had been with him in his conversion, and they had an intention of founding an Oratory at Birmingham; others joined them; then it was determined to split into two; certain men split from their connection with Father Newman, and established a separate Oratory in London, and elected their own superior, and since that date they have been perfectly independent of him.

2629. But substantially it is the same kind of congregation or community?—Yes, the same kind of congregation; at the same time there is very little to prevent the community of the Oratorians very much modifying their customs; I mean, for instance, their work; and at Birmingham their work has been modified from ours by having a school, which shows the independence of the congregations; they keep a boys' school, which we do not.

2630. There is nothing to prevent your changing, in any way you please; and though you claim to be an independent community associated at present, subject to certain rules, you may have different objects and purposes to-morrow?—Yes; the only thing is that, I think, the authorities would object to our calling ourselves by the name of Oratorians if we entirely altered the whole idea of the rule, because that might lead to misunderstanding.

2631. Mr. Bourke.] To what authorities do you refer?—The archbishop might object to persons being called Fathers of the Oratory, which term has a distinct meaning, if we entirely altered our character.

2632. Chairman.] Did I rightly understand you to say that you are subject to the bishop?—We are subject to the bishop in all matters of the church, as priests; for instance, we could not hear confessions or preach without his leave; we are entirely subject to him as priests.

2633. You are, to all intents and purposes, as independent as any of the regular orders are of the bishop?—Yes; there is a distinct difference between us; the regular orders if they are once admitted bring with them certain privileges; for instance, they preach and hear confessions without leave from the bishop, whereas we have no privilege of that sort at all. The only thing which the archbishop could not do is that he could not tell us, for instance, to leave the Oratory and take some distant mission; having once allowed us to live in the house there, he could not order us out of the house to take some other mission.

2634. He could not interfere with you in any respect whatever in your church or congregation, could he?—Yes; he could stop our preaching or hearing confessions.

2635. And that he could not do with respect to the Regulars?—I am really not prepared to say; I know that he cannot do everything with respect to the Regulars, but I do not know what their privileges are.

2636. If they have built a church, for instance?—They must get his leave originally to build the church; no one could enter the diocese without leave from the bishop.

2637. You mean that the leave is derived from the bishop, not from Rome?—Of course the Pope could supersede any bishop, but a religious house would have to ask the bishop's leave before it established itself; but I think that when it had established itself it would have certain privileges which the bishop could not stop; but in our case we are simply depending upon him, with the exception that he could not move us about from one part of London or the country to another.

2638. What would prevent your claiming for yourselves the same privileges as any regular order?—Because we have not got them; I suppose that those privileges have been conceded.

2639. Conceded, not by the bishop?—No; but I suppose when they were approved at Rome.

2640. Do the regulars refer to their superior or their general at Rome?—Yes; or wherever he may be; some have their superior in France, some have him in Ireland, and some have one in England; but they have certain things in which they are bound together as an army.

2641. But at present you only refer to the bishop in England?—Precisely so; in England.

2642. And that upon rare occasions?—For instance, any leave which any other priests require we require the same; if we wanted to have any special service in our church we require the bishop's leave, and we should have to ask for it just like the parish priest of Chelsea.

2643. Did I not understand you that there is no actual obligation to be a priest belonging to this community, and that you might be laymen?—Yes, we might be, but that was not quite my intention in what I said at first; my intention was rather to call attention to this fact, that it would not be fair, because 10 secular priests live together, and look like monks, to argue that they were so, unless there was something about their status which made them cease to be secular priests and become monks; I rather referred to what Mr. Smee said last Tuesday, that we must judge by the look of things, and that the looks of things in this institution was so manifestly monastic that it was sufficient to carry proof with it.

2644. But I think you stated that monks are not always priests?—No, they are not.

2645. Therefore, in this case, they might look like priests, and they might all be laymen?—No, that would be an exception; we are supposed to be secular priests and clerics by the object of our association. I was asked the question the other day, by a man who wanted to come to be a member ber without being a priest, and I said that it was so unusual that I did not know whether it would be granted, because we are an association of secular priests, for the purpose of carrying on a certain kind of work, namely, preaching daily, and constant attendance at the confessional.

2646. And in one case in this country in superintending education?—Yes, they have a school attached to their house at Birmingham.

2647. Is it not found, amongst those rules, that you must be in the priesthood?—They are spoken of all the way through as clerics and priests.

2648. The founder did not contemplate that they should be exclusively priests, did he?—It is understood all the way through; it grew up in the first place in this way: St. Philip merely had some friends living with him who carried on the work with him; at last it grew into more like a community, and after his death they agreed to go on living in the same way, and they drew up the rules which practically had existed before, and made them into constitutions upon which they intended to live; and we had taken them as our model. I ought to have said that we do have certain members living with us who act as lay brothers, not exactly as servants, but they look over some of the household offices, and they live with us; but they do not pay pension.

2649. But are they paid themselves?—No, they are not paid themselves, excepting their board, and they have their clothes given them; in the same way, they can leave any moment they like, or we could send them away any moment we like.

2650. Are they people of an humbler class of life?—Yes.

2651. When a father joins the Oratory, do you require some contribution from him?—Yes, he is bound to pay, as we pay, 52 l. a year, as his own pension, and for everything else we may keep ourselves; and we pay extra for certain things which we may vary in the use of; for instance, coals and candles, and such things as we require, we pay for extra. We pay for our board; but as to anything else, clothes, pocket-money, and everything else, we are perfectly independent, and have to pay for ourselves.

2652. Each individual pays his own account in that respect; but is there a sum which each contributes when he first enters?—No; there is only the pension, paid quarterly.

2653. Practically, I presume, there is something given on entering?—No, there is no sum given at all; in fact, a donation of money would hardly be received then, because it only could be given as a free gift, and one would hardly like, on a person joining, to take any money from him till he had been some time with us, and felt an interest in the institution; I think, if anybody offered me a sum of money on entering I should decline it.

2654. Has the community actually possessed itself of any land or houses?—We have a house and ground at Brompton, and a house and ground at Sydenham for a country house.

2655. That is near a burial ground, is it not?—The burial ground is a portion of it.

2656. Was that a gift made by any of the fathers?—It was a gift really of Father John Bowden, who had property at Lewisham, and this was a waste bit of ground which had not been built upon, and he gave it to the congregation for the purpose of having a change of air from London.

2657. There is nothing in the rules of the community to preclude it from acquiring property, whether by gift or purchase?—No, there is nothing about it; there is no allusion made in the rules to any common property.

2658. Was not the bequest of Father Hutchison to another father?—Yes, to another father.

2659. And the bequest made provision in case of his death before the death of the testator to go over to another father?—Yes.

2660. Is that founded upon any model form of will or deed that is known to the community?—Not at all.

2661. Is it only the custom?—No, not a custom; it was simply his own wish. He did not wish to leave any of his money to Mr. Smee. I do not think he had any other relations in the world but the Smees, and therefore he had only to choose between the Smees and some friend; he distinctly wished to leave his money to some friend, and not to the Smee family. I can only say for myself that I am perfectly free to leave any money that I have to anybody I like in the wide world.

2662. Do you do what is called missionary work; do you attend upon people as priests?—Yes, we do, in the parish.

2663. Do you perform all the duties of priests?—Entirely.

2664. When you say you have a parish, is it a parish the boundaries of which you have marked out for yourselves?—Which the archbishop has marked out for us. When we came to Brompton, Chelsea parish, which is a very large one, was divided, and the cardinal, I think it was, or his vicar general, marked out the boundary of what we call our parish, and which we look after as parish priests.

2665. And you administer religion there strictly according to the rites and ceremonies of the Roman Catholic religion?—Yes.

2666. There has been no question raised as to your right of doing so, having derived your authority from the archbishop originally?—Yes; a secular priest, when he is ordained, can either be ordained on his patrimony upon which he undertakes to show he can support himself, and that makes him, to a certain extent, independent of the archbishop; or he is ordained on the missions, as it is called in England; that is to say, the archbishop ordains him for his own purposes, and then he is bound to serve wherever the archbishop wishes. Of course a priest who is ordained on his own patrimony could not go and work wherever he likes; but supposing he chose not to work at all, the archbishop could not make him work, which is the same idea as they have in the Anglican Church of a title for orders. In our case we can demand to be ordained on our own patrimonies; that is to say, we undertake to the archbishop to support ourselves.

2668. Must you have his authority, supposing you resume your duties?—Yes, nobody can work in

in a bishop's diocese without leave from him; but, on the other hand, a priest may decline working if he likes.

2669. To all intents and purposes, according to your statement, the Oratory is a religious community?—It depends upon in what sense you use the word religious; if you use it in a technical sense, the same as monastic, I should say, no; but if you mean a pious community for religious purposes, it is so, certainly.

2670. But you have no other purposes than those connected with the administration of religion?—No.

2671. Mr. Newdegate.] You mentioned a learned work, the Dictionary of Moreri; are you acquainted with the Dictionary by Louis Moreri, a priest and doctor in theology, published in 1740, in Paris?—I do not know the work.

2672. He mentions this:—"*Oratoire.—Congrégation de prêtres établie à Rome, et en quelques autres endroits d'Italie, par Saint-Philippe de Néri. Ce saint homme qui, dès le tems qu'il était laïc, avait taché de porter un grand nombre de gens à la piété par l'établissement de la Confrairie de la Trinité, ayant reçu les ordres sacrés en 1551, entreprit de tenir dans sa chambre des conférences, où il se trouvait bientôt un si grand nombre de gens de tous états, qu'il fut obligé à demander aux administrateurs de l'église de St.-Jérome de la Charité un lieu ample et spacieux, qu'il accomoda en forme d'oratoire. Les exercises spirituels furent transférées l'an 1558 dans ce lieu, que Saint-Philippe ne quita que l'an 1574, pour aller demeurer à Saint-Jean de Florentins, où il demeura jusqu'à l'an 1563. L'église de la Vallicella lui avait néamoins été donné dès l'an 1575, du consentement du Pape Grégoire 13e, qui approuva sa congrégation. Tous ses disciples se réunirent dans cette maison, d'où le saint fondateur en détacha quelques-uns pour aller faire des établissements semblables à Naples, à San Severino, à Fermo, et à Palerme. On ne fait point de vœux dans cette congrégation, dont le général est élu tous les trois ans, mais il peut être continué autant de tems qu'on le juge àpropos. Il n'y a des maisons de l'Oratoire unies à la maison de Rome que celles de Naples, de San Severino, et de Lanciano; dans cette dernière on a établi un séminaire; les autres maisons, qui sont en assez grand nombre en Italie, sont séparées les uns des autres. Il est sorti de grands hommes de celle de Rome, Les Cardinaux Baronius, François-Marie Taruggi, Octave Paravicini, Nicholas Ifrondrati, Leandre Collorédo, et plusieurs autres." Moreri mentions this oratory as an oratory established in Italy with some different houses, but he also mentions another oratory, the Oratoire de Jesus; to which of those two orders does yours belong?—To the Italian one. The French one had some very marked contrasts. They had a general, and were quite different altogether from the associations called oratories in Italy.

2673. Has not your order a general?—No.

2674. There are two bulls establishing the order of Oratorians; under which of those two bulls or briefs are you constituted?—I do not know to what you refer.

2675. There is one brief of Paul the Fifth, relating to the Order of the Oratoire, and there is another brief of Gregory the 13th, which brief of Gregory the 13th goes into great detail as to the constitution and organisation of that order?—I think you will find it is addressed to a particular congregation, and not to congregations in general.

2676. No; they are both addressed to congregations?—If you look at the title, I am almost sure you will find that it was an oratory of the particular city it was addressed to.

2677. The first bull was addressed to a particular oratory, and it was in these terms:—Sec. I. "Dudum liquidem omnia beneficia ecclesiastica cum cura et sine cura, apud sedem apostolicam, tunc vacantia et inantea vacatura collatimi et dispositioni nostræ reservavimus; decernentes ex tunc irritum et inane si secus super his à quoquam quavis auctoritate, scienter vel ignoranter contigerit attentari. Cùm itaque postmodum parochialis ecclesia B. Mariæ Vallicellæ nuncapatæ, regionis pontis seu parionis de urbe per liberam resignatione dilecti filii Antonini de Adjuto, nuper ipsius ecclesiæ rectoris, de illa quam tunc obtinebat in manebus, nostris sponte factam et per nos admissam, apud sedem eamdem vacaverit et vacet ad præsens, nulliusque de illa præter nos hæc vice disponere postuerit sive possit, reservatione et decreto obsistentibus supradictis. Et sicut dilectus filius Phillipus Nerius presbyter Florentinus, ac præpositus nonnullorum presbyterorum et clericorum præfatorum et nominibus nobis nuper exposuit quod hi in ipsa ecclesia introduci cupiant, ac ita illis gratia assistente divina circa missarum et aliorum divinorum officiorum in eadem ecclesia celebrationem, et verbi Dei populo inibi interessenti prædicationem, aliaque salubria monita ad salutem animarum Christifidelium procurandum, et quamflurima pietatis opera exercenda intendere sperent, ut ex eorumdem presbyterorum et clericorum laudabili vita et doctrina dilecti filii ipsius ecclesia parochiani non parvam consolationem spiritualem suscepturi sint, si in eadem ecclesia una congregatio presbyterorum et clericorum de Oratorio nuncupanda, perpetuo angiretur et instituereturipsaque ecclesia cum onere curæ animarum ipsius parochianorum præfatorum eidem congregationi concederetur, ex hoc profecto divinus cultus ac ministrorum ecclesiasticorum numerus, in ea ad Dei lautem et eorumdem Christifidelium animarum salutem maximum susciperit incrementum. Quare dictus Phillipus asserens dictæ ecclesiæ, et ille forsan annexorum, fructus redditus, et proventus, super quibus pensio annua quadriginta scut. monetæ certæ personæ ecclesiaticæ illam annuatim percipenti, Apostolica auctoritate, ut dictus Phillipus etiam asserit reservata existit, centum et triginta ducatorum auri de camera secundem communem extimationem valorem annuum non excedere, eisdem nominibus nobis humiliter supplicavit, quatenus præmissus annuere de benignitate Apostolica dignaremer." (II.) "Nosigitur qui dudum inter alia voluimus quod semper in unionibus commissio fieret ad partes, vocates quorum interesset, quique divini cultuo argumentum et Christifidelium animarum salutem sinceris desideramus affectibus, pium et laudabili Phillipi Præpositi, ac presbyterorum et clericorum præfatorum desiderium summopere commendantes, apsosque Phillipum Præpositum, ac presbyteros et clericos à quibusvis excommunicationis, suspensionis et interdicti, aliique ecclesiasticis sententiis, centuris et pœnis, à jure vel ab homine, quavis occasione vel causa latis, si quibus quibus quomodolibet innodati existunt, ad effectum præsentium dum taxat consequendum, harum serie absolventes et absolutos fore censentesi hujusmodi supplicationibus inclinati, in dicta ecclesia unam congregationem presbyterorum et clericorum sæcularium de Oratorio nuncupandam, sine alicujus præjudicio, auctoritate Apostolica tenore præsentium perpetuo erigimus et instituimus." (IV.) "Necon eidem congregationi illiusque rectori, ac presbyteris et clericis suo tempore existentibus, ut pro salubri statu et directione ecclesiæ et congregationis hujusmodi illiusque personarum quæcumque statua et ordinationes rationabilia honesta, ac sacris canonibus et concilio Tridentino non contraria cœdere, et edita reformare, limitare et mutare, ac ilia de novo condere prout et quoties eis secundum rerum et temporum qualitates videbitur expedire, quæ quidem statua et ordinationes postquam edita, reformata, limitata et mutata, ac de novo condita fuerint, à sede præfata approbari, et per singulares personas de gremio dictæ congregationes existentes inviolabiliter observari debeant, libere et licitè possint et valeant, auctoritate Apostolica et tenore præfatis indulgemus, liberamque desuper facultatem concedimus et elarginum"?—The whole of this brief gives certain privileges to the congregation established in the church of St. Mary de Vallicella, in Rome, which exists now, just in the same way as if we applied to the Pope now, and asked for certain privileges addressed to our church, we should get them.

2678. You are now looking at the brief of Gregory, but there is one of Paulus Quintus (handing the same to the Witness); does either of those briefs refer to the Oratorians as now constituted?—This one is to the French Oratory which we have nothing to do with; the Oratory of Jesus in France is distinguished from our congregation.

2679. And that is distinctly recognised by Moreri?—Yes.

2680. But it seems under this other brief, that of Paul, your congregation is recognised?—No; that only recognised the one at Rome, and we can either be established in the diocese by leave of the archbishop, or if we want it we must apply separately to Rome for a brief establishing us; supposing we wanted it, we might apply to Rome for power to do it, and the Pope might give to a house in London a brief, which would carry no privileges to any other house except that house.

2681. You describe yourselves as the Oratory of St. Philip Neri?—If persons use the words "Order of St. Philip," they use it in a wrong way.

2682. Are you not of the Order of St. Philip Neri?—No, because he founded no order whatever.

2683. I have used the wrong word; are you not the general congregation of St. Philip Neri?—He founded no general congregation; I think the history of it is perfectly plain; he simply founded an association of priests in Rome, and he gave no hint of his intention of having it spread about in different places; if any secular priests in other cities choose to form themselves into a similar association, and take the model which St Philip gave at Rome as their pattern, they have liberty to do so, if the bishop in the first consents, and being so founded as any other association, they might get certain privileges from Rome just as any confraternity in London might get certain privileges.

2684. They obtain their faculty, in fact, from there?—If they choose; they are not bound to do so.

4 July 1870.

2685. But I conceive you have obtained a faculty from Rome?—We have, but we did not at first; but you must not think that that is anything remarkable; most churches in London have some brief from Rome giving them certain privileges.

2686. But as a congregation have you a faculty from Rome?—For certain privileges.

2687. I think Father Faber went to Rome, and Mr. Hutchison with him?—That was before they were Oratorians.

2688. Before the foundation of the congregation of which you are a member?—Yes.

2689. You say that it is a community, in the sense of living together?—Yes.

2690. But you say it has solely an appearance of being monastic, and you say that it is not monastic, because it has not a rule?—I do not think I said that.

2691. Have you a discipline?—I did not say it was not monastic because it had not a rule, because I think many associations may have a rule without being monastic; in fact, it is impossible to live together without some sort of rule.

2692. The distinction between a regular priest and a secular priest is, as I understand, that the one lives according to a rule belonging to some order; is not that the fact?—That is the etymology of the word, but I think you will find that the distinction always given is that one must be bound by a vow, and the other not.

2693. This is generally a congregation of priests?—Yes.

2694. I hold in my hand the "Pontificale Romanum," which I obtained from Mechlin, published in 1845, and this is the promise of obedience which you have made as a priest on being ordained; I will read the words, and then put the book into your hands. The archbishop, or whoever is ordaining, uses these words: "Tum genuflexus adhuc ordinatus point manas suas junctas inter manas pontificis interim dicentis: si suus sit ordinarius: Promittis mihi, et successoribus meis reverentiam, et obedientiam? Et ille respondet: Promitto. Si verò pontifex non est suus ordinarius, cùm manas ejus inter suas tenet, ut præfertur, dicit presbytero sæculari: Promittis pontifici ordinario tuo, et sacerdoti verò regulari: Promittis prælato ordinario tuo, etc.: Promittis pontifici (vel prælato) ordinario tuo pro tempore existenti reverentiam, et obedientiam? Et ille respondet: Promitto." I will ask you whether that is not a correct copy, from where I began to read of the Pontificale?—Yes; it is certainly a correct copy of the Pontificale, as far as I know; I am unfortunately, not being a bishop, not quite fully versed in it, but I made, I believe, all those promises on being ordained priest, and I certainly mean to pay every respect, and reverence, and obedience to the archbishop, so that I have no difficulty about the promise.

2695. But you will observe that in the order of ordaining there is a different mode and different terms employed to a secular priest and a regular priest?—Yes, and we should follow the mode of the secular priests; there would be no distinction made in our case at all.

2696. Who is your Ordinary?—The Archbishop of Westminster, Dr. Manning.

2697. Then I understand that Archbishop Manning is the ordinary whom you, as superior of this oratory, obey?—Yes.

Rev. W. T. Gordon.

4 July 1870.

2698. To whom you have sworn obedience?—Yes, according to the form there.

2699. Then the Archbishop recognises the Oratory?—He does.

2700. I hold in my hand a translation, which I believe to be correct, of "The bull of our Holy Lord Pius 4th, through Divine Providence, on the Form of the Oath of the Profession of Faith," and this is the obligation which the bull says shall apply in these terms, "Since, then, according to the arrangement of the Council of Trent, all those who henceforth should be set over cathedrals and the superior churches, or to whom it should happen to superintend any of their dignities, canonries, and any other ecclesiastical benefices whatever, having cure of souls, are bound to promise and swear that they will make a public profession of the orthodox faith, and that they will remain in the obedience of the Church of Rome, we being willing that the same shall be observed also by all persons whatsoever belonging to monasteries, convents, religious houses and all other places of every order of regulars, even of the military orders under whatever name or title; to this effect, in order that the profession of the same faith may be uniformly exhibited by all, and that one certain form of it may become known to all, discharging the office of our solicitude," and so forth. Further on the person who is to make profession of this faith says "I acknowledge the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Roman Church for the mother and mistress of all churches; and I promise and swear true obedience to the Bishop of Rome, the successor of St. Peter, Prince of the Apostles, and Vicar of Jesus Christ. I also profess and undoubtedly receive all other things delivered, defined and declared by the sacred canons and general councils, and particularly by the Holy Synod of Trent; and likewise I also condemn, reject and anathematise all things contrary thereto, and all heresies whatever, condemned and anathematised by the Church." I have two translations here by good scholars; I believe that is the purport, is it not, of that declaration required under the brief of Pius the 4th?—I really do not quite catch what you are referring to. There is the creed of Pope Pius, which is commonly used by converts to which that may refer, but I really do not know.

2701. Is that not a true translation (handing the book to the Witness)?—I have no doubt that it is a correct translation; I do not know where this is supposed to be made; I do not know what is being referred to at all.

2702. This is another copy deposited at Oxford, and I believe it is a correct copy?—I have no doubt it is.

2703. Every priest promises obedience to the Holy See, does he not, in the terms I have read?—Yes, every priest.

2704. The congregation of the Oratory to which you belong has been recognised, has it not, by the Pope, that is, by the supreme authority of the Roman Church?—Yes.

2705. This particular oratory of which you are superior, has been duly recognised?—Yes. May I make one remark, that a great number of the confraternities in London have been equally recognised.

2706. But this is a congregation of priests, and it has been recognised by the Holy See?—Yes.

2707. And you have stated that your ordinary is Dr. Manning, whom you describe as the Archbishop of Westminster?—Yes.

2708. And he has recognised the Oratory, and you as superior?—Yes.

2709. Then if I understand rightly, owing obedience to the Holy See and owing obedience to Dr. Manning as superior of the Oratory, you are bound to inculcate obedience to those authorities, according to the rules of your institution, which have been sanctioned by the Holy See?—Yes; I do not know what the meaning of "according to the rules of your institution" means. I am only bound to obey the bishop and the Pope like any other priest. Of course our institution supposes that we are Catholic priests, and that we are bound to obey the bishop, and bound to obey the Pope. I do not see what is peculiar to me in that.

2710. You are bound to maintain discipline within the Oratory, are you not, it being an establishment over which your authority is recognised, first by the Holy See, and then by Dr. Manning, whom you describe as Archbishop of Westminster?—I certainly am bound to do my best to maintain proper order and discipline in the Oratory. I do not quite see what is the use of the reference in your question to the Archbishop of Westminster; I am responsible to the archbishop to a certain extent. I suppose if any priest were doing anything against the good order of his diocese, he would ask me how I allowed it in the house without telling him; but the archbishop could not come and inquire into our private concerns, any more than he could into the private concerns of a secular priest. The archbishop's authority, of course, is limited by custom. You do not suppose that when a secular priest promises obedience to his bishop, he entirely becomes that bishop's slave; he merely obeys him in things proper to his office.

2711. You are aware that, under the brief of the 9th of September 1850, all previous customs were cancelled by the authority of the Holy See?—Are you speaking of the brief establishing the hierarchy of England?

2712. Yes; are you aware of that brief?—I do not know that brief much.

2713. In the case of your own establishment, you have explained to the Committee that, in consequence of the facility or privilege that you have obtained, or rather, I believe, your predecessor obtained from the Holy See, your obedience to the bishop is limited by the definition of the privilege which maintains your congregation?—Yes; but not more than he had himself limited it by allowing our congregation to be established in his diocese.

2715. You had the authority of Cardinal Wiseman, the predecessor of Dr. Manning, whom you describe as Archbishop of Westminster, for your establishment, and for the discipline which you maintain there?—Yes.

2716. In fact the members of your congregation are by those authorities set apart for the particular functions of your congregation?—Yes.

2717. And that was the meaning of your answer to the Chairman, that you could not be sent to one place or another, or appointed to functions inconsistent with the privilege which your your establishment has from the Holy See?—Yes; but I might add, to prevent misapprehension, that it might be the same with any professors of a college; there is not anything peculiarly monastic in that; a college might have the privilege of not having their professors taken from them after they are once established.

2718. You stated that the establishment at Birmingham has the privilege of teaching, or the function of teaching, which your establishment at Brompton has not?—Yes; which shows that we are dependent upon the bishop, to a certain extent, and independent of each other; it is no privilege; it is a work.

2719. But has to each of those establishments, it has its particular functions and particular constitution recognised and established by the sanction of the Holy See, and that sanction and regulation are recognised by the bishops?—Might I explain; an association of priests might undertake any work at all; they might get a brief from the Holy See, blessing and approving their works, and the archbishop might consent to allow them to abstain from other work for a time, until they had finished it; if persons think that a brief from Rome implies something very extraordinary, they ought to be informed that even individual Catholics get briefs.

2720. But your congregation is formed upon the model of others?—Yes.

2721. Recognised and declared in works which have been popularly put forth by your predecessor as proper to a congregation of St. Philip Neri?—Yes.

2722. Then you are strictly, in the sense of the Roman Catholic See, a congregation according to the institution of St. Philip Neri?—Yes; which institution is not monastic, but is a community of secular priests, as stated in the brief of the Pope, and everywhere where you see it referred to in any formal document; and, therefore, to say that we are not secular priests would be to alter the description of us which you will find in every authentic work.

2723. Nothing that I have said implies that you are not secular priests, but you say that the privilege and regulation of your house is that you live in community?—"Privilege" and "regulation" are words which should not be put together; we do live in community, and if we left the community we should no longer be members of it certainly.

2724. I suppose you would have the Committee infer that there would be no peculiar dispensation required in order to allow any member of the congregation to leave the community of which you are superior?—None whatever.

2725. But so long as he is in that community he is bound to observe the conditions of that community, and the rules and discipline of that community?—I do not know what you mean by "bound."

2726. Is it not part of his engagement to do so on entering?—There is no sort of engagement on entering. Of course nobody would join, nor should we accept anybody who told us that he did not intend to obey the rules of the house, because he would be a most unpleasant member. We have power, under certain circumstances, of expelling unpleasant members, as any other association would have; but you can hardly use the term "bound" of any person who has never stated in any form of words that he does intend to obey us.

2727. You stated that you have the power of expelling, which of course is very necessary to discipline; that is a power common to yourselves and to the order, I suppose, and to several other orders?—And to every club.

2728. But it is common to the order of Jesuits and other religious orders?—Yes, and to every other association in the world, I should suppose.

2729. I think I gather that this congregation is an organisation known to the Holy See?—Certainly.

2730. And has the sanction of the Holy See?—Yes.

2731. And their joining that association to a certain extent limits the power of the archbishop over the priests forming part of it?—Yes; but of course he can limit it by refusing to ordain any priest to join it if he wanted to stop it.

2732. I am not speaking of the period prior to the ordination of one of those priests, but I am speaking of his status when a member of this congregation or community?—Yes; but as I stated before, other priests when the archbishop ordains them have a certain limit to the power which he has over them, and our priests are ordained on their own patrimony.

2733. But your previous evidence goes to the effect that both the priests who become members of this congregation or community and the archbishop occupy a relation towards each other defined by the sanction of the Holy See?—I suppose I must say yes, although that has not been the course of practice.

2734. Your vow of obedience, therefore, as a secular priest, is regulated in its application to each member of your community by the sanction which you have described?—How does my vow of obedience apply to the members of the community? I do not understand the object of the question. My promise of obedience is to the bishop.

2735. As an officer of the Holy See?—Yes.

2736. Then if the superior authority, in the manner which you have described, has separated the members of this congregation or community for particular functions, that separation and definition by the superior authority must bind the archbishop?—Yes, certainly, or rather it is that the superior authority has conceded to us a certain liberty; that is the case with every authority.

2737. I wish to understand that word, "liberty"; does it not mean liberty to live in community, and pursue certain functions and certain work which the Holy See has approved?—Yes, and so every parish priest has a certain authority from the archbishop; when he is really a parish priest he cannot be removed by a concession I suppose from the Holy See, which is the author of all authority in the Roman Church, therefore it is not peculiar to us.

2738. Therefore your relation as a community of secular priests stands quad the work to which you are separated from other parish priests in the same relation as the obligation of a parish priest to his bishop?—There is a similarity certainly.

2739. And therefore this community is as much established by the same sanction and aurity as the duties of a parish priest?—Yes.

2740. And one of the duties of you, the superior, and of the members of the congregation, is to maintain in your own case, and to obey in their case, the discipline of this community?—Yes.

2741. I think

4 July 1870.

2741. I think I understand you to say that the oratorian order, at all events, the branch to which you belong, has no general?—I object to the word "order," and I object to the words "branch to which I belong," because that implies some common trunk, of which there is none.

2742. I will put the question in another form; you alluded to another description of oratorian order, and you said that that description had a general?—Yes.

2743. And you say that your branch has not a general?—No, it has not.

2744. Therefore the archbishop being your ordinary, stands in relation to you as the general does to the other branch of your order?—No; the expression "branch of our order" has no meaning at all.

2745. Then I will put the same question, only varying it by saying to the other oratorians of which you admit the existence?—I should answer that question by saying no; I do not think that the archbishop stands towards us in the same relation as a general to an order; the whole idea is quite separate; if a person does not know the ordinary sense in which those words are used, it is very difficult to answer the question. The archbishop is in no sense our general in the sense of a general of a religious order; the two ideas are perfectly incompatible.

2746. My question did not imply that the archbishop was general of your order; but I asked whether as your ordinary your obedience to him consistently with the rules of your congregation is not completely due?—Yes, certainly.

2747. You spoke of lay brothers, and you said, did you not, that you could dismiss them more summarily than the fully admitted members of the congregation?—Yes.

2748. How is the case with novices; can you dismiss a novice more easily than a fully admitted member?—Yes; he is not a member at all.

2749. What is the period of the noviciate?—Three years before he acquires certain rights.

2750. Should you consider the some period of noviciate necessary for a priest as for a layman?—Yes, because the object of it is to test his suitability to our association and his being an agreeable person.

2751. And that he is applicable to the work to which you have been separated?—If a priest could not preach or could not hear confessions, I do not think that that need be an insurmountable obstacle to his being a member of our association.

2752. I put the question again; what is the use of a noviciate for a priest unless it is to test whether he is a person well fitted to become a member of your congregation or community?—A person that we should like to associate ourselves with.

2753. Then am I to understand that your congregation or community has no duties?—It has duties certainly; but I say we might very possibly have a member who from some infirmity was not fit for all the objects of our institution; the principal ones are prayer, which everybody is fitted for; preaching, which all people are not fitted for, and hearing confessions.

2754. And also the propagation of the faith?—Every priest, of course, has that at heart and every Catholic too, I should think.

2755. Your community does not disown that which you consider to be a common duty and function?—Certainly not.

2756. And you would reject a novice who might feel neither inclination nor aptitude for his work?—Who was not a good Catholic, certainly we should.

2757. You would consider him not a good Catholic if he did not seek to propagate his faith?—Yes, certainly, in every way he could.

2758. Therefore you are associated for a certain work?—A work which is the ordinary work of priests.

2759. To be pursued in community?—Yes.

2760. And you admit those whose aptitude for that common work you believe in?—That is not the only qualification.

2761. But it is one qualification?—Yes certainly.

2762. Evidence has been given with respect to the property of the congregation, and also with respect to the property belonging to members of the congregation; is there no property which belongs to the community or to you, as superior thereof?—There is no property belonging to me as superior of it, excepting what I have myself; but there is property, certainly, which belongs to the community.

2763. And that property, as superior, you respect?—Yes, certainly.

2764. I have here attested copies of two wills; will you be kind enough to look at that attested office copy (handing the same to the Witness); it is in these terms: "Extracted from the principal Registry of Her Majesty's Court of Probate. This is the last will and testament of me, Frederick Fortescue Wells, of 25, King William-street, Strand, London, and now residing in the City of La Valetta and Island of Malta. I give, leave, devise, and bequeath unto the Reverend Frederick William Faber, residing at 25, King William-street, Strand, London, and in case of his decease, unto the Reverend William Hutchison, also residing at 25, King William-street, Strand, London, all sum or sums of money, securities for money, as well in private as in public hands, household furniture, plate, linen, books, and generally all other the residue, after payment of my just debts and funeral expenses, of my personal estate wheresoever and whatsoever for his sole use, benefit, and disposal, hereby creating him, the said Reverend Frederick William Faber, and in case of his decease, the Reverend William Hutchison, as my universal heir of such my said personal estate. And I constitute and appoint the Reverend Thomas Frederick Knox, also of 25, King William-street, Strand, London, sole executor of this my last will and testament, which, if from any unforeseen informality, should not be valid as such, then I desire it may have the force and effect of a codicil donation by reason of death, or any other less formal testamentary act. And I hereby revoke all former wills and testaments. Witness my hand and seal to this my said last will and testament, contained in two sides of a sheet of foolscap paper, in the aforesaid city of La Valetta and Island of Malta, this twelfth day of February in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty. Frederick F. Wells. (L.S.) Signed, sealed, published, and declared by the said testator, Frederick Fortescue Wells, as and for his last will and testament, in the city and island aforesaid, in the presence of us, who in his presence, at his request and in the presence of each other, have hereunto set and subscribed our hands as witnesses thereto on the day of the date above written."

itten." "Witnessed by P. E. Vermote and hn Cummings." This is an attested copy, and at will was proved for the benefit of the person erein named, was it not?—I suppose so.

2765. That constituted part of the property t of which the congregation was established? No.

2766. Are you quite sure of that?—That will, believe, left nothing at all. I was going to xplain why it is that so many fathers would naurally leave their property to some other father, ecause very often it consists simply in their ooks and furniture and pious objects, which I ink would be of little value to one's own relaons who, perhaps, may be Protestants; but he aves the property to one who understands its ature. Father Wells, I happen to know, died 0 l. to the bad, and what passed under that will as merely his books and furniture and pious jects.

2767. Whatever he had, passed under that ill?—Yes, under that will.

2768. To the persons therein named?—At his present moment I believe so; from my own nowledge I do not know what happened.

2769. Did you know Father Hutchison?—es.

2770. Is it not the fact that he was collecting library for the Oratory, you so stated n your evidence, I think?—No, he fitted up he library of the Oratory and put bookshelves nd that sort of fitting up.

2771. Did he not contribute some books?—Yes, we all do. We frequently give books to he library.

2772. The books there mentioned were left nder the will to him as one of the persons mentioned?—Father Wells' books, I remember as a fact, were sold to pay his debts; I bought some f them myself.

2773. If there had not been those debts you would have respected his will?—I should have nothing to do with it. The person who was executor would have acted upon the terms of the will, I suppose. I had nothing to do with Father Wells' will the least in the world.

2774. But the person mentioned as executor would have respected that will?—I believe so.

2775. You believe it?—Certainly.

2776. Now I will read to you another extract from the principal Registry of Her Majesty's Court of Probate: "I, the Very Reverend Frederick William Faber, of the Oratory, Brompton, in the County of Middlesex, Doctor of Divinity, at present Superior of the Association of persons consisting of Roman Catholic priests, students for the Catholic priesthood, and lay assistants, now associated, and living together in a society called or known as the congregation of the London Oratory of St. Philip Neri, which society is now established at Brompton aforesaid, do hereby revoke all testamentary dispositions heretofore made by me, and declare this to be my last will. I give the copyrights, which shall be subsisting at my death, of the several books and pamphlets of which I am the author, and also my unpublished manuscripts of a literary character unto the Reverend Charles Henry Bowden, of the Oratory aforesaid, absolutely, or in case he shall die in my lifetime, unto the Reverend Edward Gilpin Bagshawe, of the Oratory aforesaid, absolutely; and I think it right hereby to declare that I have not parted with, sold, or otherwise disposed of, any of my copyrights or manuscripts. I give, devise, and bequeath all my real and personal estate and effects, of what nature or kind soever, of or to which I may die, seised, or possessed, or in any way entitled, or over which I may have any disposing power, and which is not hereby otherwise disposed of, or may not be hereafter otherwise disposed of, by any codicil hereto, unto the said Charles Henry Bowden for his absolute use and benefit, or, in case he die in my lifetime, unto the said Edward Gilpin Bagshawe for his absolute use and benefit; subject in either case to the payment of all my just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses. I hereby declare that in case neither of them, the said Charles Henry Bowden and Edward Gilpin Bagshawe, shall survive me, or it shall be uncertain whether neither of them did survive me, it shall be assumed for all the purposes of this my will, and such will shall take effect and operate, and the gifts, devises, and bequests hereby made shall be carried out as if the said Charles Henry Bowden had survived me and died immediately afterwards. I appoint the said Charles Henry Bowden, if he shall survive me, sole executor of this my will; but in case he shall die in my lifetime, I appoint the said Edward Gilpin Bagshawe sole executor of this will. In witness whereof I, the said Frederick William Faber, the testator, have, to this my last will, set my hand this Twelfth day of August in the year of our Lord One thousand eight hundred and sixty-three. Signed, Frederick William Faber. Signed and declared by the said Frederick William Faber, the testator, as and for his last will, in the presence of us present at the same time, who, in his presence, at his request, and in the presence of each other, have hereunto subscribed our names as witnesses. William T. Gordon, clerk to the Oratory, Brompton; Charles Few, Covent Garden, Solicitor. Proved at London, 8th December 1863, by the oath of the Rev. Charles Henry Bowden, clerk, to the sole executor, to whom administration was granted;" that is a correct copy of the will?—I have no doubt it is; I do not think it is very difficult to understand; Father Faber's works were all extremely Catholic works; and to leave the copyright of them to his brother, who is an Anglican clergyman, would not have been very probable. I do not think it requires any great explanation that Father Faber should naturally leave his books to some person in whom he would trust to carry out the publication of them.

2777. It appears, as is proved by the production of the will of the late Father Hutchison, and also by the will of the late Father Wells, and also by the will of the late Father Faber, that it is the habit of members of the Oratory to leave their property to some member of the congregation, and the administration to other members of the congregation?—It has been so done; but it forms no part of our custom, no part of our rules; and I distinctly declare that we are as perfectly free to leave our money to whomsoever we like as you are.

2778. Subject to your sense of duty to your functions as priests and members of this congregation?—Everybody makes his will subject to a sense of duty, I suppose; and certainly in many cases there are very natural reasons why a priest should leave his property, when it is of a certain nature, to some friend, rather than to some Protestant relation who would be very much embarrassed by it. But there is no sort of inducement held out in any way for them to make wills in favour of each other; I cannot say that too strongly; I am as free as you are every bit, by every custom and every feeling of honour, and feeling of duty, and everything else.

2779. But your feeling of duty and honour, of course, being the Superior of this congregation, does not revolt against the practice which is described by the production of those wills?—I object to the use of the word "practice"; but my feeling does not revolt against any man leaving his property to whom he likes; but I deny that that establishes a practice, or that there is any practice of that kind established. Each of those cases could be explained, I think, if you knew the circumstances.

2780. You think there is nothing inconsistent with the known character and sense of duty which prevailed in those persons in the disposition which they made of whatever property they died possessed of?—I have no objection to the wills they made at all.

2781. And it is probably from this sense of duty and those feelings, that the property of which you are at present the administrator, as Superior of the congregation, has accrued?—No, I did not say that I thought it was the duty of those persons to make those wills; but that it was not inconsistent with their duty to make those wills; that was the question which you asked me.

2782. My last question was this: you said that you thought that such a disposition of property was not inconsistent with the character and sense of duty of the persons of the class whose wills have been produced before this Committee?—Yes, not inconsistent.

2783. And I ask you whether it is not probable that the property which this congregation occupies, has not so accrued?—No, it is not probable; certainly not.

2784. How have you or the other members of your community become possessed of this property, which is occupied in common?—Cannot people give money without willing it? Father Hutchison gave, as has been stated, 7,000 l. towards the building of the house.

2785. Then probably the contributions, out of which this property was aggregated, were by gift prior to death?—Father Hutchison gave 7,000 l. without any deed at all.

2786. And all those persons are bound to respect the organisation of which they are members, and the work to which they are devoted?—Yes, everybody is, I should think; that is nothing peculiar to us; everybody in the world, I suppose, is bound to respect the work to which he is devoted.

2787. And those persons are, as priests of the Church of Rome, devoted to this work?—To the work of priests.

2788. But as priests for the time being of the Oratory to the work of the Oratory?—There is no distinction between the work of the Oratory and the work of a priest; that is your mistake all the way through. The Oratorians are bound to do the work of priests in preaching, and in the administration of the sacraments, in a particular church. There is no object in the institute apart from ordinary priests' work.

2789. But you have described the distinction between your obligation as priests and members of this community as being different from the obligation of other priests not being members of this community?—I should not say that our obligations were different.

2790. Then I will put it that the functions are different; are they not?—No; we have the liberty to live together as other priests, and we have the liberty not be moved about at the archbishop's option; that is our only privilege.

2791. The privilege is that you are exempted from being moved about from one function to another, but other Roman Catholic priests may be moved at the discretion of the archbishop?—Yes.

2792. Mr. Pease.] Are you still of opinion that there is a broad line between a conventual and monastic institution and the congregation of which you are the superior?—Yes, I am distinctly.

2793. Have we been correctly informed that every member of a conventual or monastic institution or society must take three vows; one of obedience, one of poverty, and one of chastity?—Yes.

2794. If I understand you correctly you are not bound by any vow of obedience to the rules of your order?—Yes; we are not bound by any vow whatever of obedience.

2795. Except those vows which priests are under?—Yes; except the implied vow of chastity which every priest takes.

2796. As to poverty, you are not bound, as a monk is, to strip yourselves of all earthly possessions before entering the institution?—No; we retain our property.

2797. And you have no superior or general?—No we have not.

2798. And every conventual institution has a general, is that the line of demarcation?—Yes, they have.

2799. And do you take parish duty?—We do in this country and in many places.

2800. Does no monk take parish duty as a monk?—As monks they do, in this country, because they may do so.

2801. Then that is not the line which is to be drawn?—No it is not.

2802. Mr. Bourke.] I did not hear the beginning of your examination, but did you say in whom your common property, that is to say, the church and land, are vested?—It is held in joint ownership. I do not think that after what I heard the other day that I should like to particularise the legal title on which it is held, but it is held in joint ownership.

2803. I think you said that Father Hutchison kept an annuity for himself when he disposed of his property?—Yes; when he gave that 7,000 l., which was only a portion of his property he stipulated that he should receive during his life the interest of it as an annuity.

2804. Then, was the money which he spent in charities and schools and so on about the town, the interest of that money?—No, because he had a great deal more property than that. I should think a great deal of it was capital; he had secured himself enough to live upon by that annuity and he spent his capital freely.

2804*. You said that your order has no connection with any other order of Oratorians in other parts of the world, is that strictly so?—Quite strictly so.

2805. No connection at all?—None whatever; it is simply the same friendly relation that a member of a scientific institution in London who went to Rome would have to a similar scientific institution there. When I go to Rome I am not bound to go to the Oratory. I have no connection whatever with it except that of sympathy.

2806. Chairman.]

2806. Chairman.] Does that apply to this country as well as to Rome?—Yes.

2807. Mr. Bourke.] Will you tell me in what way do you sympathise with the Roman Oratorians?—In fact they are a similar body to ourselves, the same way as if you were a member of a scientific society in England, a botanist we will say, and went to Rome and found an exactly similar society; if you gave them proof that you were a member, probably you would be taken as an honorary member for the time, and treated in a more friendly manner than another person would. But we do not live in their house when we go to Rome; we have no claim to do so there.

2808. Chairman.] Did I understand you to say that none of this community were monks themselves, or had been so?—No, and they never have been.

2809. Is there anything to prevent their being so?—Yes, it is one of our rules (which we could dispense if we chose, because we could dispense all our rules), that we should not receive a person who had been a monk.

2810. Then any one of the regular orders is positively excluded by your own rules from belonging to your community?—Yes.

2811. Do I understand you to say that you can vary those rules as you like, and whenever you like?—We can interpret the rules as we like; but it would be hardly fair to the archbishop to say, "We will establish ourselves under these rules," and then go and change them afterwards.

2812. If there was a change you would communicate it to the archbishop?—Yes.

2813. What is the rule with respect to changing names; if any father joins you, is it the case that you request him to drop his own name, and he takes another?—No, we do not require him to do so; it is simply this; I believe in Italy they generally call people by their full name; but in England we hate long names, and for familiarity's sake we have got into the way of calling each other by our Christian names; if I spoke of a father of the Oratory to an outsider, I should call him Father Faber or Father Hutchison; but speaking amongst ourselves we call each other after our Christian names; when there happen to be two fathers of the same name we then take the second name, and if he has not a second Christian name, we then take his confirmation name. All Catholics when they are confirmed take some name of some saint in addition to their baptismal name, and therefore it becomes one of their names; when a person is confirmed, the bishop calls him by his name; he may, if he likes, take the same name as his baptismal name, but, generally speaking, Catholics take a new name; the name of Anthony was taken by Father Hutchison when he was confirmed, but his baptismal name was William; there was at that time Father Penny, who is now in Dublin, and who has left the congregation altogether; his name was William; so Father Hutchison was called Anthony simply for convenience.

2814. To what period of his life do you refer?—He was converted, and, I suppose, he was confirmed at Birmingham immediately after his reception; generally speaking, after a convert has been received into the Church, he is confirmed at the first convenient opportunity; I do not know when Father Hutchison was confirmed; I did not know him in those days, but he must have been confirmed long before he was a member of the Oratory.

2815. And it was upon that occasion that he assumed the name of Anthony?—Yes; William was his own name; according to the practice of all Catholics taking a new name, when he is confirmed the bishop addresses him by this name; he says, "Anthony, I confirm you."

2816. Does he drop his other name?—No; he used to sign himself legally William alone, but commonly he called himself William Anthony Hutchison; I took the name of Philip when I was confirmed, and for some time I added it to my name; then I thought it would be convenient on account of legal documents to drop it; but my name in confirmation was Philip.

2817. Is it correct that on Father Hutchison's tombstone, the name of Anthony is alone inscribed?—No, it is not; it is William Anthony.

2818. Then there was no difficulty in his relative discovering whom the tombstone belonged to?—Not the slightest; I think that Mr. Smee made a complaint of Father Wells's tombstone, which he had nothing to do with; Father Well's relations did not object at the time; Mr. Smee was present at the time of the funeral, but, of course, no tombstone was then erected. Mr. Smee objected to the advertisement in "The Times," being William Anthony Hutchison, but that we put in because as a matter of fact he was known by a very much larger number of people as William Anthony Hutchison since he had become a Catholic than as William Hutchison.

2819. What is the number of your community; is it limited?—No.

2820. Has it gradually increased since it was founded?—It has varied very much; at this moment there are 15 priests resident, there have been more at one time.

2821. Mr. Pemberton.] Must they all be resident?—Yes, though they be absent for a time; there has one been away now for 10 months.

2822. If they bonâ fide cease to be resident, do they cease to be members?—Yes.

2823. Chairman.] But you have nothing to do with education?—No, excepting the poor schools.

2824. Are there poor schools in immediate communication with the Oratory?—Yes, we have in the parish about 500 children under our management and care.

2825. But does the Oratory support the school?—No, that is part of the parish work; we collect subscriptions from the parishioners for carrying on that work, and that we do as parish priests.

2826. Are subscriptions obtained for any other purpose?—When Father Hutchison founded the large ragged schools in Drury-lane, he obtained subscriptions for that purpose, but we have given them up since his death.

2827. Is there not money collected in the chapel?—Yes.

2828. Does that all go to the common fund?—No; as a matter of fact, we do not live by the church; therefore, we spend any money that we collect in the church upon the church, because it says in our constitution that we are, as far as possible, to militate upon our own stipend; that is, to live upon our own money; therefore, we have always abstained from using the money of the church for any other purpose but the service of the church.

2829. But collections are regular there?—Yes, like any other church.

2830. But they are generally applied to the church?—Yes.

The Rev. JAMES HARWOOD HARRISON, called in; and Examined.

Rev. J. H. Harrison.
4 July 1870.

2831. Mr. Newdegate.] I THINK you are the Rector of Bugbrooke, near Weedon?—I was formerly; 12 years ago.

2832. I believe that your late son was captain of the school at Westminster, was he not?—Yes.

2833. And he was induced, at the age of 18, to join the Oratorians at Brompton?—I understand that he received a letter from Father Faber saying that if he would join the Oratorians they would allow him 100 l. a year, and they sent him 3 l. to pay his travelling expenses.

2834. That is a matter within your own knowledge?—Yes, certainly.

2835. Your son was re-baptised, I think?—He was baptised at nine o'clock at night.

2836. Was this contrary to your parental authority?—It was done to prevent my having any power of interfering; I have it in my son's own handwriting that it was done to prevent giving me any chance of interfering.

2837. I understand that your son became a novice in this establishment?—Yes; I have a letter in his handwriting, in which he states that he is a novice.

2838. Will you read the letter?—"You should not write to me about Father Faber in the way you do, only, of course, you do not know: to me he stands in the place of God and St. Philip, being superior of the Oratory where I am a novice."

2840. Mr. Newdegate.] Did your late son, by his expressions to you and other members of his family, and by his conduct, show you that he considered himself subject to a strict discipline?—His letter shows it: "If you wrote to me a letter abusing God and St. Philip it would make me love them, of course, the more, and it is the same with the father, but especially does it do so at this time when he is lying at Arundel on a bed of sickness and intensest agony, and, though recovering, even yet in a state of danger, all entirely resigned as he is to the will of God. I can never murmur at his slightest wish, however much I may not understand it; I know that he will never let me see any of my relations out of this house whilst I am a novice, except papa, out of respect to him."

2841. May I ask, did you judge from the expressions used by your son to yourself and the members of your family, that your son would b obedient to whatever might be enjoined upo him by the superior of the Oratory?—I thin that he was completely under the control o Father Faber; that is what I concluded fro the letters I had.

2842. And you formed that opinion from hi conduct?—I had no control over him in th slightest degree after he went there.

2843. You have stated that you conceive tha he was completely under obedience to Fathe Faber; and I ask you whether you did not form that opinion from the general conduct of you late son?—I should say so, decidedly.

2844. Did your son live long enough to be come a regular member of that order?—He live to be nearly 25 years of age.

2845. How long was the noviciate?—Three years.

2846. I think you stated that he joined at 18?—He was just turned 18 when he joined.

2847. Do you conceive that your son was a full member of this congregation of the Oratory at the time of his death?—In a letter to me he describes himself as a member immediately after he was admitted; a few days after he postulated, and a few days after he was admitted he wrote saying that he was: he described himself in this way, "I am an Oratorian, and a child of St. Philip."

2848. What was the date of that letter?—According to the dates that I have he postulated on the 29th of May, and this letter must have been written within about eight days afterwards, in 1861.

2849. That was within the period of the noviciate?—Yes; I suppose that the noviciate commenced as soon as he was admitted.

2850. And your son never left this congregation or institution?—Never, 2851. Mr. Gregory.] Have you that letter with you?—I was summoned in such a hurry that I had only an opportunity of making a few extracts; I do not think I have it, but I know I copied out parts of it.

2852. Mr. Newdegate.] Will you supply the date of that extract?—The date of the letter is June 4th, 1861.

2853. Your belief is that your son became a full member of this institution after his noviciate?—In the first letter that he wrote to me after, he said, "I am an Oratorian, and a child of St. Philip," and he then quoted a long passage of poetry ending, "We are Philip's gift to God." I have seen letters addressed to him, "The Rev. F. Harrison," whilst he was a novice.

2854. That was during his noviciate?—Yes.

2855. But your son remained in the Oratory till the period of his death, as I understand?—Yes, he died there.

2856. Seven years after?—He went there in May 1861; he died on the 18th June 1867. He was little more than six years in the Oratory.

2857. And you believe that he died a member of that congregation or institution?—Certainly; he said so, certainly.

of duty and of obedience to the superior which he at first expressed?—No, I am not aware of it. He came to see me in the year 1863, and again in 1867, and then he seemed to me to be completely under orders. I tried to persuade him to stay with me; during the very year that he died I wished him to stay with me three or four weeks, but he said he could not. He seemed to me to have no control over his own actions, but to be completely under the control of the Oratory.

2859. Chairman.] Did your son constantly communicate with you during those seven years?—With most of the family. I was abroad a great deal; I have got, I dare say, from 60 to 100 letters by me that he wrote to myself or his brothers and sisters.

2860. Did he constantly refer to his relations with the superior of the Oratory?—I cannot exactly say, my memory will not serve me.

2861. Did he constantly speak of his submission, and his obedience, and his respect for the superior?—I do not recollect it in every letter, for I had not time to read over the letters before I came up.

2862. You have no reason to suppose that he was dissatisfied with having entered the community?—No; but he felt that he was perfectly dependent, and he did not like his dependent state; he frequently wrote to me to ask if I would make him an allowance.

2863. An allowance with a view to remain there?—Yes.

2864. There was no other reason why he wished to leave it?—No; he could have left it whenever he liked; I offered to receive him again if he would leave it.

2865. But you were not disposed to comply with his request if he remained there?—No; not when he was baptised at 9 o'clock at night; I should never have thought of such a thing; when I was told that he was going to enter the Oratory, I wrote to Father Faber the strongest protest that I could, to say that I could never give my consent, or make any allowance; but I assisted by allowing him wine and articles of dress, &c., from my London tradesmen.

2866. You do not know of anything that was done there, or what were the habits or practices of the Oratory while he was there; you cannot tell us anything about that?—No; I am not aware that I can particularly; I was summoned so suddenly that I had no time to refresh my memory with the facts; I only looked over two or three of the early letters, and made what extracts I thought might be necessary.

2867. Mr. Gregory.] Did you ever attempt to exercise your paternal control over your son for the purpose of withdrawing him from the Oratory?—I once intended to have applied for a writ of habeas corpus, but I felt confident it was no use.

2868. Without applying for a writ of habeas corpus, you might have tried by persuasion, as far as your means went, to withdraw him from the Oratory; did you do that?—Yes; of course, I tried to argue with him all I could, but it was of no avail; I had not the slightest chance.

2869. You, as a father, tried to exercise such power as you had, short of exercising your legal rights to withdraw him from the Oratory?—Most certainly I did; I protested against his going there, and I offered if he came out again to maintain him.

2870. What was his reply to that?—He said that he felt that he had a call from God to go to the Oratory to be a priest; that was the answer he always made to me; he died just about the time that he might have been a priest: there is a letter to me in which he said, "I have a call to go to the Oratory to be a priest."

2871. Chairman.] You know nothing yourself about the rules and conditions of this community, except what you might have gathered from the letters of your son?—I gathered from the letters of my son, and from other sources, that the house had a cloisterial character, that he was admitted by the comfraternity, that on admission he wore the peculiar dress of the order, that he underwent a very severe noviciate of three years' duration, and that females are altogether excluded from the interior of the building. Had my son lived to be a priest, he would not have assumed the dress of a secular priest, bnt have retained that of his order. This and the rule of abject obedience to the superior, and almost total seclusion from his family for the space of three years, coupled with the refusal to allow a sister to enter the house (although accompanied by her husband) to take farewell of a dying brother, on the plea of the absolute exclusion of females, all tend to show, in my opinion, that the Oratory at Brompton is a monastic institution; of course, I speak with great dlffidence, for it seems to me to be a question to be settled by courts of law; and I have understood that a court of appeal in Italy has given a decision that the Oratorians are a monastic institution.

2872. There was nothing to prevent his leaving the house occasionally, was there?—No; I am not aware that there was anything to prevent his leaving it.

2873. But you do not seem to be aware that those fathers must all be priests; your son never was a priest?—No, I believe not; I should say not.

2874. Your son was seven years there?—He entered in May 1861 and died in June 1867.

2875. Did he ever tell you that he made a vow of any kind?—No vow, that I am aware of, was taken by my son; had he been ordained a priest, he would then have taken a vow.

2876. Mr. Newdegate.] But the tenour of your evidence is that his sense of obedience was complete?—I should say so, decidedly.

Mr. JOHN MCDERMOTT, called in; and Examined.

2877. Mr. Newdegate.] YOU were at one time connected with the Brompton Oratory, were you not?—I was.

2878. In what capacity?—I belonged to the congregation of the Oratory, and subsequently I was a brother of the society called the Brotherhood of the Little Oratory.

2879. Are there several classes?—There was that class, because the general public were excluded from the Brotherhood of the Little Oratory; it was an entirely distinct association within the same precincts.

2880. Chairman.] I suppose in the same building?—In the same building.

Mr. J. McDermott.

2881. Mr. Newdegate.] Can you state the nature of the promise that you made at the altar on becoming a brother?—The promise was very simple, because it was a distinct association from the fathers and brothers of the Oratorians. The association of the Brotherhood of the Little Oratory was entirely distinct from any of the priests and the brothers of the Oratory.

2882. Chairman.] You describe yourself as having belonged to the Brotherhood of the Little Oratory, and you were asked what you promised at the altar on that occasion?—At the time that I was enrolled a brother of the Little Oratory, I promised that I would uphold the authority of the then Dr. Faber (he was then the head of it), if it was necessary; and also I was to be guided entirely by the instructions of my father confessor, at that time the late Father Wells; he was my father confessor.

2883. Mr. Newdegate.] He was a member of the Oratory?—Yes; he was one of the priests of the Oratory.

2884. When you speak of a different association, does it meet in the Oratory at Brompton?—Yes, it does. I have not seen it for 10 years now; but at the time I saw it last, it used to be at the extreme end of the Oratory; that was the end of the residence of the priests and brothers. It was a detached building; it was a building at the extreme end. It was not exactly detached, but was close to it.

2885. If I understand you rightly, what you call a separate association is rather a separate class within the Oratory?—Except that it was not of a clerical character.

2886. It was a lay class within the Oratory?—Exactly.

2887. Can you state what constitutes a father, and what constitutes a brother, in this congregation?—I should like you to define the question; do you mean as to the fathers and brothers, or as to the class that I belonged to myself?

2888. You have stated the class to which you belonged, and I now ask you what constitutes an Oratorian brother, as he is designated, or a father, in that congregation?—A father, as far as I have been able to learn from members of the congregation themselves, was one who was bound by vows, and a brother was not; a brother was a novice.

2889. What do you mean by vows; do you mean that he was an ordained priest?—Yes.

2890. And that his vows formed part of the obligation by which he was bound in that institution?—Yes.

2891. And a brother was a novice?—Yes; a brother was a novice.

2892. I understand that there are from 30 to 40 bedrooms in it; can you describe the building at all?—I would not like to state the number of rooms that there are now, though I have been over the house, very nearly all of it.

2893. Are there a large number of bedrooms there or not?—There are a large number of rooms.

2894. Do they open into a corridor, or how are they arranged?—Yes, on the lower floor upon a level with the church there used to be a door leading from the church to a passage and in that passage the rooms were entirely devoted to private confessionals, as far as I am aware; and upstairs, through another door leading upstairs, there were bedrooms; underneath that was a hall called Saint Wilfrid's, if I remember aright.

2895. Do you consider that the building is of a conventual or monastic character?—Most decidedly.

2896. You know it well?—Yes, I know it well. I was always under the impression that the priests of the Oratory were as much monks as any other of those societies that I know of the same denomination.

2897. Do they assemble together?—I never saw them myself, but I hear that they all dine in one place, or are in the habit of taking their meals together.

2898. Then, I think that this institution is connected with two convents of women, is it not?—Yes, I believe so.

2899. What is your reason for believing it?—Because I have heard the inmates of one of those women's convents say so. They told me that they were under the control of the Oratory priests, and that no one else had any authority over them.

2900. What convent was that?—It was one that was then near the corner of Ovington-square, in the Brompton-road, and the other was somewhere in the immediate neighbourhood of Old Brompton, if I remember right, at the corner of Hertford-road or Victoria-road.

2901. Do you know the house and estate belonging to the Oratorians at Sydenham?—No; I know that there is one there, but that is all I know.

2902. You have not seen it?—I have never seen it.

2903. Do you know for what purpose it is used?—I think it was used as a place of punishment, or retreat for the fathers.

2904. You have never seen it, and you do not know whether there is a burial ground there?—Yes, I know that; but not from my own knowledge.

2905. When you use the expression "punishment," you mean a period of fasting and abstinence?—That was it; we boys used to call it punishment: when they sent them (the fathers) in retreat, that was the name given to it. They were sent there for periods varying from a week to a month, or they went there and we were told that they were sent.

2906. By punishment you mean a severer discipline?—Severer discipline than they otherwise would have in the Oratory at Brompton.

2907. But you do not know that from your own knowledge?—I do not; it is simply from hearsay.

2908. Do you understand that the house which you have described at Brompton belongs to the Oratorian congregation, or some of them?—It is the joint property of all, I am led to believe.

2909. That is your belief?—Yes.

2910. Do you know anything of the rules for the regulation of this congregation?—I have heard; I know nothing from my own personal knowledge, only from hearsay.

2911. Mr. Pemberton.] You said you thought that the difference between a father and a brother of this community consisted in the fact of a father taking vows, and a brother not; what authority have you for saying that?—One of the fathers.

2912. What was the name of the father?—If it is essential to the inquiry I will give it; but otherwise I would rather decline.

2913. What

1213. What I want to understand is this, did you understand from the father that a vow was taken as a member of the community, or was it simply a vow which he had taken as a priest?—As a priest.

2914. In that particular case was he a priest before he joined the Oratory?—No.

2915. Then he took one vow when he joined the Oratory?—Yes.

2916. I suppose you can hardly tell me whether that was a vow as a priest, or as a member of the Oratory?—A vow as a priest, I understand.

2917. Mr. Gregory.] You spoke of some promise that you made when you went to the Oratory, as I understand; did I gather rightly that it was a promise of obedience to the superior?—Yes.

2918. To whom did you make that promise?—It was to a person that is dead now, who was then the head of the brotherhood of the Little Oratory, Father Wells; I have heard that he is dead.

2919. Mr. O'Reilly.] You said that you were a member of what is called the Brotherhood of the Little Oratory, and on becoming such member you made this promise; what is that brotherhood of the Little Oratory; of whom does it consist?—Of laymen.

2920. Young men living in the Oratory district?—Yes; young men who had been members of the congregation.

2921. Members of the congregation of the Oratory; do you mean in the sense in which the priests are members of it, or laymen who are in the Roman Catholic parish of Brompton?—Yes; people who are in the habit of attending church.

2922. Young men living in the Oratory parish; tradesmen's sons and gentlemen's sons, you mean?—Yes.

2923. Mr. Matthews.] And married men, some of them?—No, unmarried men.

2924. Mr. O'Reilly.] Are they all necessarily unmarried?—I do not know whether it is necessary, but they were all unmarried; as far as my experience went, they were all young men or rather boys.

2925. Am I correct in describing it as exactly like the Catholic Young Men's Society, or the Christian Young Men's Society?—Yes, it may be so.

2926. What obligations did they undertake, or did you undertake?—None; only to be more attentive to my religious duties than I should have been in any other case.

2927. But it was only an association of young men who agreed to promise to observe their religious duties more strictly than they would otherwise have done?—Quite so.

2928. But in the same religious duties as other laymen?—Yes.

2929. To go to confession more frequently?—Yes, and to attend church oftener than you otherwise would do; that was the obligation upon you.

2930. Was there any specific obligation of attending church, or only as often as you could?—If you did not attend church, and you could do so, there was a penance attached to your not doing it.

2931. Then as to this promise of obedience, what did you understand by the promise of obedience; was there any obedience beyond the subject-matter of the association, behaving yourself as a good Christian?—No, only that; and we were to consider whoever was then the head of the brotherhood, our obedience was due to him, and he was in the same relation to another superior.

2932. Your obedience was due, in fact, whilst you were in the room; but you owed no obedience to him when you were in the world; you were not obliged to obey him in the ordinary matters of the world?—No, simply in religious matters.

2933. There are some rules, I believe, of this association?—Yes, I had a copy myself.

2934. Will you be good enough to put them in?—I wish I could; I have not seen them for 10 years, and it would be rather difficult.

2935. How often do the brothers of the Little Oratory assemble?—I think it used to be twice a week; Wednesdays and Fridays; I am not sure.

2936. The attendance is not obligatory, I think?—No.

2937. When they did assemble, what did they do?—Sing and pray; that is all.

2938. You said at first that, besides being a member of the brotherhood of the Little Oratory, you were a member yourself at one time of the congregation in the Oratory?—What I meant by saying that I was a member of the congregation is, that it was my parish church that I went to. I do not call the clergymen the congregation.

2939. When you said that you were at one time a member of the congregation of the Oratory, in answer to the honourable Member for Warwickshire, you simply meant that you were a Roman Catholic, living in that district of London, which is called by the Roman Catholics the parish of the Oratory?—Yes.

2940. Then you have no personal knowledge yourself as to the rules or institutions of the congregation of the Oratory, have you?—No personal knowledge.

2941. You said that one of the fathers of the Oratory told you that fathers or priests took vows, but that brothers of the Oratory did not take any; am I right in that?—Perfectly right.

2942. Did you understand that he meant to take any vow, except the obligation of a secular priest at his ordination?—That I could not say.

2943. What did you understand it to mean, then?—My understanding at the time I am not able now to go into. My impression was that he was under a vow, the same as any other Roman Catholic priest of any community.

2944. Not only of any community, but any Roman Catholic community?—But there are different Roman Catholic priests.

2945. And some are bound by other vows?—Yes.

2946. But your knowledge does not carry you further than that he was bound by the same obligations as other Roman Catholic priests?—Just so.

2947. Did you say that the members of two convents, or of one convent, told you that they were under the control of the priests of the Oratory?—One told me.

2948. About the other, what do you know?—I have simply seen the fathers going in and coming out of the convents.

2949. Have you ever seen any other priests, besides those of the Oratory, going in and coming out of the convent?—Never, and I was there every day; my duty took me past there frequently day and night.

2950. You saw members of the Oratory going in and out, but you do not know whether they had had anything more to say to it?—I know perfectly well that they were in the house; that is all I could know.

2951. What convent inmate was it that told you?—Of the one near Ovington Square.

2952. A member of one convent told you?—Two told me.

2953. Two told you that the inmates were under the control of the Oratory priests?—Yes.

2954. Can you tell me who those were?—Yes; Agnes Shea was one, and Catherine Sheeney another.

2955. Were they nuns?—No; they were boarders, I believe, in the house, or novices, or something of that description.

2956. Do you know whether they had any knowledge as to who had the control of the convent?—I suppose they must have had.

2957. Would boarders necessarily know that?—Yes, I should imagine so; if I was a boarder in a school I should certainly know who the master was, I think.

2958. Would not the nuns be the mistresses of the building?—I presume so.

2959. Mr. Matthews.] None of those members of the brotherhood of the Little Oratory live in the house belonging to the Oratory, I believe?—None.

2960. You have used the phrase "novice" as applied to brothers; that the brothers are novices, and the fathers are priests?—Yes: not of the Little Oratory, but of the Oratory, what you would call the congregation of the Oratory.

2961. You mean that there are two sorts of people whom you call brothers?—Yes.

2962. Mr. Sherlock.] How many years is it since you have had any connection with the brotherhood of the Little Oratory?—Not since 1859.

2963. Chairman.] Do you know yourself what are the vows that people take who belong to monastic institutions?—Obedience, I believe.

2964. But had you those vows in your mind when you thought that priests took vows, belonging to this Oratory?—Yes, I knew what they were.

2965. You knew the vows that they took?—Yes.

2966. They were not vows that are taken in monastic institutions?—I beg your pardon; I say I know the vows that priests take in general on ordination, and I imagine that the vows that the Oratorians took were of course the same.

2967. Do you know the vows that people belonging to those monasteries take?—I have heard so; I do not know them; I have never seen them written down by any competent authority.

2968. You did not mean those vows when you said that you thought the priests in the Oratory took vows?—Yes; I did mean those vows.

2969. Mr. Matthews.] Do you imagine that every Roman Catholic priest takes monastic vows?—By no means.

2970. Do you know what monastic vows are?—I cannot say that I do.

2971. Some vows that you did not know you thought somebody took?—Just so.

2972. Mr. Newdegate.] You answered that you believed that the fathers took vows, and you knew that they were priests?—Yes.

2973–6. It was owing to some difference with respect to the property of your family that you left the congregation, I think?—No; not through any property.

2977–8. It was from a conscientious objection that you left the congregation?—Yes.

2979. Mr. Bourke.] Are you still a Roman Catholic?—No; I have not been a Roman Catholic since 1864.

2980. Mr. Newdegate.] You left the congregation, and also became a Protestant, I think?—Yes; I subsequently became a Protestant.

2981–2. You were not expelled?—No.

Friday, 8th July 1870.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE CHARLES PELHAM VILLIERS, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. ROBERT ROSS, called in; and Examined.

Mr. R. Ross.

8 July 1870.

2983. Mr. Newdegate.] I BELIEVE you are a ludent, resident in London?—I am.

2984. Where do you reside?—At 36, Vincent- quare, S.W.

2985. Have you a verified extract from the aluation list with reference to the Oratory at rompton?—I have.

2986. Will you have the kindness to read it to ie Committee?—I may say that I am perfectly ire of it to begin with, the extract being made y my own hand. I refer to the Roman Catholic)ratory, Brompton, so called, under the heading Name or situation of property." The name of ie occupier of the property is recorded as the Reverend William Thomas Gordon. Under the eading of "Name of Owner," I find "Trustees)r the Reverned Fathers who occupy, the Reverends J. F. Knox, E. G. Baghorne" which I understand ought to be Bagshawe), and the Reverend C. H. Bowden." Under the escription of property rated, it is described as House and grounds;" and, as I mentioned efore, it is described as the "Roman Catholic)ratory, Brompton," under "Name or situ- tion of property." The gross estimated rental f the property is 800 l., and the rateable value of t is 667 l.

2987. With regard to the entries in the Roman Catholic Directory, you have procured extracts rom the valuation list I believe with respect to he Convent of Sisters of Mercy in Cadogan- street, London, S.W.?—It is described in the Romish directory as "Mercy (Sisters of), Cado- gan-street, Chelsea, S.W."

2988. Mr. Cogan.] Were these extracts from he valuation list all made by yourself?—By my own hand.

2989. Mr. Newdegate.] What is the extract with respect to that property?—Under "Name or situation of property," I have entered Cadogan- street; under the "Name of occupier," the Rev. R. G. McMullen; under the "Name of owner," Sir Francis Shuckburgh; under the "Description of property rated," I find "Industrial school"; the gross estimated rental is 255 l., and the rate- able value is 225 l. In connection with this property there is a house in Cadogan-terrace, which is adjoining, under the "Name or situation of property;" I find Cadogan-terrace, Cadogan- street the Rev. R. G. McMullen is again the occupier, and Sir Francis Shuckburgh again the owner; it is designated as a house; the gross estimated rental is 85 l., and the rateable value 71 l.

2990. Do you verify that extract?—I have done so.

2991. Mr. O'Reilly.] What is the exact de- scription of the last property?—Cadogan terrace.

2992. Mr. Newdegate.] Have you an extract from the valuation roll with reference to property held by the Carmelites?—Yes; under the "Name or situation of property" I have Hermitage Lodge, Lillie-road; the "Name of the occupier," Selina D'Orcott; the "Name of owner," J. T. Peacock; "Description of the property rated," "house, offices, and pleasure grounds"; the "Gross esti- mated rental" 126 l., and the "Rateable value" 107 l.

2993. That is a verified extract?—It is a verified extract.

2994. Have you a verified extract with respect to the property of the Sisters of the Assumption of the Perpetual Adoration of the Blessed Sacra- ment?—I have; under the "Name or situation of property;" this is described as "Convent, Portobello-road, Notting-hill"; the "Name of the occupier" is Mrs. M. Burton; no owner's name is recorded; it is described under "De- scription of property rated," as a house; the "Gross estimated rental" is 420 l., and the "Rateable value" 350 l.

2995. Chairman.] Is there any reference to these orders in the entries?—No; I got that in- formation from the Romish directory.

Mr. WILLIAM JOHNSON, called in; and Examined.

Mr. W. Johnson.

2996. Mr. Newdegate.] YOU are a Farmer, resident at Stretton-on-Dunsmore, are you not?—Yes.

2997. That is near Rugby?—Yes.

2998. I think you have been a member of the assessment committee of the poor law union?—Of the Rugby Union Assessment Committee.

2999. You have been so for many years?—Yes;

Mr. W. Johnson.

8 July 1870.

I am not now, but I was from the commencement up to two years ago.

3000. You knew the property upon which the Convent of Princethorpe stands, before it was built?—Yes, well.

3001. Living as you do in the immediate neighbourhood?—Yes, about a mile from it.

3002. That property was sold for the purposes of this convent by a Mr. Benjamin Russell, was it not?—Yes.

3003. What is the name of that convent?—St. Mary's Priory.

3004. What is the name of the resident priest?—Father Grosvenor.

3005. Can you produce an extract from the valuation list with reference to this property?—Yes; I have one; it was all made in my presence.

3007. Just give the items from your list as they stand; what is the gross estimated rental of the whole property?—£. 858.

3008. And the rateable value, I think, is 20 per cent. less for building, and 10 per cent. less for the land?—Yes.

3009. Will you give the detail of the property; there is a farmhouse, is there not?—Yes.

3010. And 11 cottages?—Yes; 11 cottages and one school-room.

3011. The whole landed property amounts to 195½ acres, does it not?—It does.

3012. Of which 6½ acres may be considered the site and demesne of the convent?—Just so.

3013. This valuation was made, I think, in 1863, and you assisted in making it?—In June 1863.

3014. And the surveyor and the solicitor appeared before your committee, did they not?—They did; the convent was originally valued at 500 l., and they appealed against that sum.

3015. Then it was stated by this surveyor that 2,000 l. was necessary to complete and repair the buildings on this property?—Yes; that was his statement.

3016. Since then additions and repairs have been recently made, and a steam engine and cooking apparatus added?—Yes.

3017. Mr. Cogan.] Do you know all this of your own knowledge?—Yes; I do.

3018. Perhaps you will tell us what has been added?—Those are the things that have been added: the cooking apparatus, a steam engine, and also a gas-house.

3019. Mr. Newdegate.] But, in your belief, this convent and the property having been put into complete repair, and additions made, has the 2,000 l. stated by the surveyor been expended?—I believe it has, and considerably more.

3020. But you believe that that sum, at all events, has been expended?—Yes.

3021. As one who was a member of the assessment committee, and accustomed to such calculations, do you believe that the property is now worth 900 l. a-year?—I do; fully that.

3022. What do you give as the gross value?—I estimated the gross value at more than 25,000 l.

Mr. Joseph Bishop, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Bishop.

3023. Mr. Newdegate.] You are a house and land agent?—I am.

3024. Resident at Atherstone?—Yes.

3025. You are Secretary of the Gas Company, are you not?—Yes.

3026. And Deputy Superintendent Registrar?—I am.

3027. Your brother is clerk of the guardians, is he not?—He is.

3028. Do you remember the purchase of the site of the convent at Atherstone?—Yes.

3029. How is that convent described?—It is now called St. Scholastica's Priory.

3030. What was the name by which it was first known?—It was dedicated to Our Lady of the Rosary.

3031. There has been a change of its description?—There has.

3032. Was there a change of occupancy also?—Yes; there was a change of occupancy too.

3033. The nuns who first occupied it have left it?—They have.

3034. Other nuns have arrived?—Yes.

3035. And there have been additions to the property, have there not?—There have.

3036. The nuns now occupying are of the Benedictine Order of the Perpetual Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, are they not?—They are so described.

3037. Do you know where they came from?—From Colwich.

3038. The convent has been twice enlarged, has it not?—It has been twice enlarged.

3039. And additional property purchased adjoining the first property?—Yes; property adjoining on either side.

3040. Can you produce a certified copy of the valuation list, showing the reputed owner's name; the extent and value of the several properties now united, with the total of the estimated value of the convent, presbytery, and land?—I can, from the valuation list.

3041. Mr. Cogan.] Was it taken by yourself?—This has been extracted by my brother's clerk, and certified by my brother; and I have myself compared it with the valuation list, and am prepared to swear to the correctness of it. "No. of assessment, 10; name of occupier, Baker Sampson Choyce; name of owner, Anderson, Miss Ann, and others; description of property, land; name or situation of property, Watling-street-road; estimated extent, 5 acres, 3 roods, 35 perches; gross estimated rental, 40 l.; rateable value, 36 l." "No. of assessment, 132; name of occupier, Gerden, Philip; name of owner, Anderson, Ann, and others; description of property, house and garden; name or situation of property, Owen-street; gross estimated rental, 19 l.; rateable value, 15 l. 5 s." "No. of assessment, 255; name of occupier, Anderson, Miss Ann and others; name of owner, Anderson, Miss Ann and others; description of property, house, garden, and land; name or situation of property, The Priory; estimated extent, 3 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches; gross estimated rental, 200 l.; rateable value, 160 l." "No. of assessment, 256; name of occupier, Anderson, Miss Ann, and others; name of owner, Anderson, Miss Ann, and nd others; description of property, gardens; ame or situation of property, Mancetter-road; stimated extent, 2 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches; ross estimated rental, 11 l. 8 s.; rateable value, 0 l. 5 s."

3042. Mr. Newdegate.] You have lately in our function of clerk to the gas company had me business transactions, I think, with the resent occupier of the Presbytery House?—I ave.

3043. I think his name is Mr. Atkins?—Mr. Atkins is the present occupier of the Presbytery House.

3044. And I think Mrs. Atkins, the wife, hom you saw, is sister to the Rev. Mr. Bowen, he officiating priest?—She is.

3045. Mr. Cogan.] You know that of your wn knowledge?—Mrs. Atkins told me so.

3046. Mr. Newdegate.] There was a question rising out of the gas for the chapel being supplied under the same account as the gas for the Presbytery, was there not?—Yes.

3047. Did you apply to Mrs. Atkins, as ccupier, for settlement of the account?—I id.

3048. Mr. Cogan.] Did she settle the account?—She settled the account.

3049. Chairman.] On whose account did she ay you?—On her own account; at least the gas ccount has always stood, and been made out to he Rev. J. C. Bowen; Mr. Bowen, the officiating priest, has always been charged with that gas, but it appears that an arrangement has been nade ——

3050. Mr. Sherlock.] Were you present at hat arrangement?—I was not. The account as always been left at the Presbytery, and has been paid.

3051. Mr. Matthews.] By whom?—I cannot say whose money it was, whether Mr. Bowen's, or Mr. Atkins's; but the money was paid by Mrs. Atkins, in the presence of Mr. Atkins.

3052. Mr. Sherlock.] Do you not receive payment from the person to whom you furnish the gas?—Not always; as a rule, we do.

3053. Is it not a private dealing between the gas company and the proprietor of the house?—No, the original contract was and is still between the officiating priest and the gas company.

3054. Is the officiating priest named?—The officiating priest is Mr. Bowen.

3055. He it was that contracted with the gas company for the supply of gas?—Yes.

3056. Mr. Matthews.] Was this Mrs. Atkins a sort of servant on the premises?—Mrs. Atkins is the sister of Father Bowen, the officiating priest; and they reside in the Presbytery.

3057. Mrs. Atkins and her husband live on the premises, and Mr. Bowen is the person to whom you supply the gas?—He does not live in the Presbytery. The gas is consumed at the Presbytery and the chapel.

Mr. J. Bishop.

8 July 1870.

3058. And the contract is with him?—Exactly. Mr. Bowen resides at St. Scholastica's Priory, a distance of some three quarters of a mile from the Presbytery.

3059. He is the Presbyter?—Perhaps so.

3060. Mr. Sherlock,] At all events he is the party liable to you in the event of your not being paid?—We hold Mr. Bowen liable.

3061. Chairman.] You received this money from his sister who occupies the premises?—Yes.

3062. Mr. Sherlock.] You would take it from me if I offered it to you?—Just so.

3063. Mr. Newdegate.] To whom do you believe you should have to apply for a final settlement of this difficulty?—Mr. Bowen, I apprehend.

3064. Mr. Sherlock.] Have you been paid in full?—A disputed account has not been paid.

3065. Disputed between you and Mr. Bowen?—No, between Mr. Bowen and the party who resided at the Presbytery House, prior to his sister and her husband residing there.

3066. Has not your Company a claim against somebody?—We have a claim; that claim has not been satisfied.

3067. Is it not a claim by you against some person?—Against Mr. Bowen, but Mr. Bowen says that Mrs. Chapman, the former resident, is the party who must pay, she having consumed the gas, and that it was an arrangement with the tenant that the tenant was to pay for the gas consumed in the house and in the chapel; it all passes through one meter.

3068. Do you intend to make any legal demand on Mr. Bowen?—We shall sue Mr. Bowen in the county court as a matter of course, if necessary.

3069. Chairman.] To whom do you look for payment?—The gas company look to the Rev. Father Bowen for payment.

3070. Mr. G. Gregory.] Have you a rating book for gas; No; Mr. Bowen is the party liable to the gas company, undoubtedly, but they want an alteration made.

3071. Mr. Sherlock.] Did Mr. Bowen tell you that he wants an alteration made?—No, Mr. Bowen's sister did.

3072. Mr. G. Gregory.] Do you make out quarterly accounts for the gas you supply?—Half-yearly accounts.

3073. To whom was the last half-yearly account made out?—To the Rev. Mr. Bowen.

3074. Mr. Cogan.] Were you summoned to attend this Committee?—I received a telegram.

3075. Did you receive a summons from the Clerk of the Committee?—I had a telegram from the Clerk of the Committee.

Mr. Benjamin Holden Fisher, called in; and Examined.

3076. Mr. Newdegate.] I believe you are resident in Rugby?—I am.

3077. What is your occupation?—I collect rates, and I give lessons in mathematics.

3078. In short, you are schoolmaster, and collect the rates?—I am not a schoolmaster; I give private lessons.

3079. And you are employed in the calculation and collection of the rates?—Yes.

3080. I believe you are cognisant of some property near Rugby; I think it is called St. Mary's Priory, is it not?—St. Mary's College.

Mr. B. H. Fisher.

3081. Can you produce an extract from the valuation list showing the value of that property?—I furnished Mr. Hobbley with a copy, and I have not another copy with me.

3082. Will you recover that extract?—Yes.

Mr. B. H. Fisher.

8 July 1870.

3083. Mr. Bourke.] Do you know the value of this property?—I know the estimated value.

3084. What is it?—The estimated value of the college is 225 l.

3085. Mr. Gregory.] That is, the college and the property they hold with it, I presume?—That is, I believe, for the college and two acres, three roods of land attached to it.

3086. Mr. Bourke.] Is that the whole of the property?—There are cottages and schools.

3087. Mr. G. Gregory.] But is the whole included in that rating?—No; the college itself is assessed at 225 l., and the rateable value is 180 l.

3088. Mr. Bourke.] Now, the rest of the property?—The estimated value of the priest's house is 15 l. gross and 12 l. rateable value; the schools are assessed at 16 l. and 12 l. 15 s., and there are 15 cottages, assessed from 7 l. up to 10 l. each. I cannot speak as to each separately; there is one at 20 l.

3089. Mr. Matthews.] Is this property all in Rugby?—All in Rugby.

3090. And the priest's house also?—Yes.

3091. Mr. Bourke.] Do you know the total rateable value of all this property?—The gross rateable value is 418 l.; rateable value 333 l. 5 s.; that is, for the cottages, the school, the priest's house, and the college.

3092. Mr. O'Reilly.] You have stated the rateable value of the whole property; do you mean by that all the property pertaining to Roman Catholic institutions in Rugby?—I do.

3093. Not merely the property of the college?—I mean the whole of the property possessed by Roman Catholic institutions in Rugby.

3094. With regard to the priest's house and schools; is that, so far as your knowledge goes, a separate thing from the college?—I believe that there is a communication from the priest's house to the college.

3095. Have you any knowledge who is the priest?—I cannot tell his Christian name; I believe his name is Akroyd.

3096. Is the Reverend Mr. Akroyd presumed to belong to any religious Order, or is he a secular priest?—I cannot answer that.

3097. Mr. Matthews.] He does the parish duty there?—He officiates in the chapel.

3098. Which is the common chapel of all the Catholics in Rugby?—Yes.

3099. He is the priest for the Catholics in Rugby, in fact?—Yes.

3100. Do you happen to know that Mr. Hibbert supports that mission?—I have understood so.

3101. And gives a good many hundreds a ye to pay the expenses?—I understood that he pu chased the property.

3102. And has contributed largely?—I cann say to what extent.

3103. Mr. Bourke.] You call this institutio St. Mary's College?—Yes.

3104. Is it called a convent at all there; d you ever hear it called a convent?—No, I hav not; I have heard it called a monastery.

3105. Can you specify anything monast about it?—I believe there are a number of monk resident there.

3106. Have you ever seen them?—I have see them. It has been stated to me that they wer monks; I have no evidence that they are.

3107. Mr. Sherlock.] Would you know monk?—I could tell those that have the appea ance of one, but I could not say that I shoul know one.

3108. Mr. Newdegate.] Whom do you unde stand to be the present owners of this property —I can state whom it is assessed to in the po rate; the person who is entered as the owner.

3109. Who is that?—The person entered owner is Dominic Gazzola.

3110. Mr. Bourke.] Who is he; do you kno him?—I do not; he is one of the residents the college.

3111. You know that?—I know that.

3112. Mr. Matthews.] He is owner of what of the college?—Of the college.

3113. Mr. O'Reilly.] Is he put down as t owner of all the other property you have me tioned also?—I think not; I believe Mr. Hutt is the owner of the cottages.

3114. Who is put down as owner of t priest's house?—I believe Dominic Gazzola put down as owner of that.

3115. And of the schools?—And of t schools.

3116. Mr. Matthews.] Who is Mr. Hobbley, whom you gave your copy of the valuation list —I only know him by sight; he called upon m for the extract and I gave it to him.

3117. When?—A few days ago.

3118. Mr. Sherlock.] Had you ever seen hi before?—No.

3119. Had he a letter of introduction to you —From the clerk of the union.

3120. Mr. Matthews.] You gave your copy the valuation list to him?—Yes.

3121. For aught you know, he came up t London with it?—I expected to see him he with it to-day.

Monday, 11*th July* 1870.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Matthews.
Mr. Newdegate.
Sir John Ogilvy.
Mr. O'Reilly.
Mr. Pease.
Mr. Pemberton.
Mr. Sherlock.
Mr. J. G. Talbot.
Mr. Villiers.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE CHARLES PELHAM VILLIERS, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JOHN ROBSON, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Robson.

11 July 1870.

3122. Mr. Newdegate.] I BELIEVE your firm is largely engaged in printing?—It is.

3123. And you have printed the Roman Catholic Directory for 1864, 1865, 1867, 1869, and 1870?—Yes.

3124. From whom did you receive the copy?—From Dr. Johnson lately; I think for the whole six numbers we have received it from Dr. Johnson.

3125. He is resident at where?—At No. 8, York-place.

3126. It is through him that you have received the manuscript?—Yes.

3127. Mr. Jessel.] Is that the Mr. Johnson mentioned in the preface?—Yes.

3128. Mr. Newdegate.] What does this copy consist of; does it consist of lists containing the names of the priests and institutions in their respective districts?—It contains every thing that you see there printed 3129. Are those manuscripts generally in different hands, or are they in the same hand?—Various, I should say; they are not wholly manuscript; they are generally the previous year's Directory pasted up with corrections on it, and those corrections are not all in the same handwriting.

3130. Then there are corrections made in the printed sheets of the previous year?—Yes.

3131. But those corrections are not all in the same hand?—No, I should say not.

3132. But at the same time if you receive them from Mr. Johnson you consider that you have authority to print them?—Undoubtedly we have; we print whatever is given to us, without questioning where it comes from.

3133. But you consider that Mr. Johnson, in fact, is your employer?—Undoubtedly.

3134. In short you would receive and print without hesitation anything that you receive from Mr. Johnson, no matter in what hand the corrections or writing might be made?—Certainly.

3135. Mr. Matthews.] Do you print it at your own risk, or is the profit Dr. Johnson's?—I cannot tell you.

3136. Do you get the profit of the sale?—No, we simply print it, and get paid for printing; we are only the printers, not the publishers of it.

3137. Dr. Johnson does not pay you?—No, the publisher pays us.

Mr. JOSEPH CULL, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Cull.

3138. Mr. Newdegate.] Do you represent here the firm of Burns, Oates & Co., Publishers?—Yes.

3139. You come by their direction?—Yes; I have got their note in my pocket.

3140. Do you come to give the information which the Committee require?—Yes.

3141. Are you a member of that firm?—No.

3142. But you are the representative of that firm for the purposes of this Committee, in obedience to the orders which they have received from the Speaker?—Yes.

3143. Are the firm which you represent the publishers of the Roman Catholic Directory?—Yes.

3144. And have you published it for the years 1864, 1865, 1867, 1868, 1869, and 1870?—Yes.

3145. I think Canon Morris was formerly the editor; that is to say, it is so stated in 1864 and 1865?—He was the editor; I do not recollect the year.

3146. But you have no reason to doubt that he was the editor in 1864 and 1865?—No, I believe it was so. I have not referred to see, but I know he was editor.

3147. Who was the editor in 1867?—Canon Morris also, as far as I know, without referring to a copy of the Directory.

3148. I will put a copy into your hand; this is a copy for 1864 (handing the same to the Witness); will you have the kindness just to read the preface?—"The editor begs leave to call the attention of the clergy to the rule by which the Directory is compiled. Whenever in the official returns of the dioceses a change has occurred since the last year in the name of the head priest at any mission, the hours of service for that mission are not reprinted without instructions from the newly-appointed priest. Where, however, the name of the same priest appears in charge of a mission, the hours of service are retained, unless an alteration be requested by the priest, or the bishop of the diocese. The names of the clergy in the alphabetical list are each year compared with those in the various dioceses, and no names are retained in the alphabetical list that do not appear in the former portion of the Directory, unless fresh instructions be sent each year for their insertion. All communications for the editor of the Directory are to be addressed to the Reverend Canon Morris, care of Messrs. Burns & Lambert, 17, Portman-street, London, W. As very unnecessary trouble and expense are caused by notices being sent after the Directory is in type, the editor begs that he may receive all that is intended for the next year's Directory before the 20th of October."

11 July 1870.

3148*. I will read to you from the Directory for 1867, in the preface, to which I perceive it says, "All communications for the editor of the Directory to be addressed to the care of Messrs. Burns, Lambert & Oates, 17, Portman-street, London, W. As much trouble and expense are caused by notices being sent after the Directory is in type, the editor begs that he may receive all that is intended for the next year's Directory, before the 25th of October. He also begs that all subsequent changes taking place before the 25th of November may be communicated to him as they occur;" that is a correct extract, is it not, from that publication?—I do not recollect whether it was Canon Morris or not.

3149. Is that a correct extract from the number for 1867?— It is one of the numbers for 1867, and this is the preface.

3150. Is what I read a correct extract?—Yes, that is correct.

3151. It appears, then, that Canon Morris was no longer editor in 1867?—I do not know; I think he was; Dr. Johnson will be able to answer that, because he knows when he began.

3152. Are you not aware that there was a change of editors in 1867?—No.

3153. The Rev. W. A. Johnson is editor of the Directory at present, is he not?—Yes.

3154. And he was so in the year 1867, I think?—No.

3155. I will read to you a short extract, in order to test whether this is accurate in the edition of the Catholic Directory for 1869: "In the present edition of the Catholic Directory the arrangements of the contents has been slightly altered; and while the size of the book has been kept down by the exclusion of part of the advertisements, a large amount of valuable information has been added. It would have been easy, by lowering the standard of the book, to bring out an inferior directory at a reduced price; but after submitting the question to the judgment of ecclesiastical superiors, it was felt to be a duty to maintain the present character of the work. For the convenience, however, of those who, in addition to a good almanac, may desire a useful abstract of some of the more general information contained in the Directory, the Directory Almanac, price 3*d.*, has been prepared, of which a notice will be found at page 2. The additional information contained in this year's Directory consists chiefly of the enlargement of its first section; the Catholic and General Almanac, pages 1 to 29; the Acts of Parliament affecting Catholics in workhouses and pauper schools, pages 46 to 48; a brief notice of martyrs in England, page 87; an appendix on the Œcumenical Council, pages 287 to 297; and an appendix, including the pastoral letter of the archbishop on the Metropolitan Cathedral of Westminster, pages 298 to 313. The only difference between the copies of the Directory prepared for the clergy, and those prepared for the laity is this; that in the latter, instead of the Latin Ordo recitandi prefixed to the Directory, there is a calendar or abridged translation of the Ordo in English. In the compilation of Part 3, which is the official portion of the Directory, the following rules will, until further notice, be observed. 1. When no change has occurred of the priest in charge of a mission, the services will be printed as before, if no alteration be requested by the priest, or by the bishop of the diocese. But when there has been a change of the priest in charge, it will be thought better, in the absence of instructions from him, to reprint only the more important services of the Sundays and holidays. 2. The names of the clergy in the alphabetical list will be compared yearly with the returns of priests received from their lordships, the bishops, and names not appearing in those returns will not be retained in the said list unless instructions be sent each year for their insertion. Communications for the editor of the Directory are to be addressed, Rev. W. A. Johnson, 8, York-place, London, W. It is earnestly requested that all information sent to him for next year's Directory may be forwarded before October 25th. Changes of names, and other slight changes taking place after that date, will, if com unicated as soon as they occur, be inserted as far as possible down to November 16th. The omission by the clergy in the notices of their missions, of such details as are only of local interest would enlarge the space available for information of general interest to the Catholic public." Just take that book in your hand, and state whether I have correctly read this extract from that publication (handing the same to the Witness)?—Yes, I have no doubt you have.

3156. Do you know what portion of this Directory belongs especially to the province of the editor, and what to the publisher; can you tell me what does the editor do with reference to this publication, and what do you do?—The editor prepares the whole, with the exception of the advertisements, which of course need not be reckoned as part of the work itself.

3157. He prepares the whole, with the exception of the advertisements, which you manage?—We receive the advertisements. I think we send them on to him latterly. We used to send them directly to the printers, but I think latterly we send them to the editor.

3158. Are you aware how the editor obtains the information inserted under the various districts, especially in Part 3?—I do not know myself. I may have heard something, but that I could not speak of positively.

3159. Your only source of instruction and information is the Reverend Mr. Johnson?—Yes.

3160. Except with reference to the advertisements?—Yes, trade advertisements, and general advertisements.

3161. You have printed upon the outside of this this work for the laity, which is in a yellow cover, "Permissu superiorum," what do you understand by that?—By permission of superiors.

3162. And who are those superiors?—I suppose the ecclesiastical authorities of the diocese.

3163. Of the Roman Catholic body?—Yes.

3164. That is what you understand by superiors?—Yes, certainly.

3165. Who gave you authority to print those words?—The editor sends the copy to the printer, and he prints them.

3166. Then it is by the authority of the editor that you have put "Permissu superiorum"?—Yes.

3167. Do you know whether the editor is the authority of the preface?—I could not say positively. I do not know from my own knowledge; if he signed his name to it, I should say that he was the author.

3168. According to your understanding you have the same authority from Mr. Johnson for the preface that you have for the body of the work?—Yes; we receive the whole from the printers, and we publish it.

3169. Including the preface?—Yes.

3170. And you receive it from the printers by arrangement with Mr. Johnson, as editor?—Yes.

3171. Mr. Jessel.] Who employs you?—I do not understand your question.

3172. You are publishers, and employed by some one to publish the book?—We employ ourselves.

3173. Do you publish on your own account exclusively?—No, not exclusively; we are part proprietors.

3174. Who are the other proprietors?—The editor.

3175. And you do publish on the joint account of the editor and yourselves?—Yes.

3176. Chairman.] What advantage do you consider arises from your publishing in your frontispiece these words, "Permissu superiorum"?—I could not answer that. I have never thought of that question. There has been a Directory printed for a great many years, and I never noticed till lately that that phrase was on the wrapper of the Directory.

3177. But you are a part proprietor?—Yes, we are part proprietors.

3178. You consider that it is an advantage to the work that it should have that authority, or words that imply that it has authority?—That is an advantage certainly.

3179. Ever since you have published it, have you inserted those words?—I could not tell without referring to a copy of each year.

3180. How long have you been the publishers?—Twelve or 13 years.

3181. Have you always placed those words, "Permissu superiorum," in the frontispiece?—I could not say without referring to each copy; I never took notice.

3182. You say that you are not indifferent to the insertion of those words; you think that there is some advantage to the work from their insertion?—Yes.

3183. Mr. Matthews.] I do not understand that you ever asked anybody's permission yourself to publish that directory?—No.

3184. And you have gone on publishing the old title page as it was without consideration?—Yes.

3185. In fact your attention has been drawn to it by the honourable Member for North Warwickshire?—Yes.

3186. Mr. Bourke.] As joint proprietor with the Rev. Mr. Johnson, do you take any means to ascertain whether the information that he supplies you is correct or not?—None whatever.

3187. Mr. Talbot.] Do not you understand that those words, "Permissu superiorum," answer very much to the words which no doubt you have seen in the works printed by the Queen's printer, "Cum privilegio," or "By authority"?—No, I do not think that they are equivalent to "By authority;" "permission" and "authority" seem to me rather different.

3188. Do not they convey to the Roman Catholic community the impression that this work is printed by the authority of the Roman Catholic Church?—Certainly not, but by their permission.

3189. More than permission, by their leave and authority?—No; I do not understand permission to be authority; it is very possible to have permission to print, but not the direct authority of the persons who give you permission; it is permitted, but it is not by authority; they are very distinct things.

3190. Chairman.] Those who take the work believe that it has authority from the circumstance of those words being printed, is that what you mean?—They believe that the authorities have allowed it to be printed.

3191. Mr. Pemberton.] At whose suggestion were the words first inserted?—I do not know.

3192. Were they inserted by you as the publishers?—No.

3193. Do you know whether they were inserted by the authority of the editor?—Possibly; it has been printed many years; it was printed so the previous year before it came into our hands, and we only followed inthe wake of others.

3194. But it was not at your suggestion as publishers that those words were inserted?—No, not that I know of.

3195. Then no person being interested but you as the publisher and the editor, probably the words were inserted by the suggestion of the editor for the time being?—I do not know; there have been many editors.

3196. You being the only persons concerned, namely, the publishers and the editor, it was not at your suggestion that those words were inserted?—I dare say that when they were first inserted we were not the publishers.

3197. Then you cannot tell whether it was the publisher's or the editor's suggestion?—No; I cannot tell how long it has been on the title page, or by whom it was introduced, because long before we published the Directory it was published by others.

3198. Sir John Ogilvy.] I suppose that it is meant as a sort of guarantee for the authenticity of the information contained in it?—I should say so; very likely.

3199. Mr. Sherlock.] Do you know how many years this publication has existed, in one shape or another?—I cannot say.

3200. A great number of years, I think?—Yes, I should say so.

3201. When was your attention first called to those mystic words "Permissu superiorum"?—Never before to-day.

3202. Mr. Newdegate.] I think you are a Roman Catholic, are you not?—Yes.

Mr. Cull.
11 July 1870.

3203. Are you aware, as being a publisher, that "Permissu superiorum" is used at Rome almost universally, to indicate approbation?—No, not to indicate approbation.

3204. Have you no communication with Roman printers?—No, we have no communication with them.

3205. Mr. Jessel.] Did you ever hear it doubted for one moment, as a representation that that Directory was authentic?—No.

3206. Has it not always been regarded as authentic?—I believe so.

3207. Do you doubt, for one moment, that the superiors would not give permission except for that which was correct?—There may be many incorrections in it.

3208. Accidental errors you mean?—Yes.

3209. But not voluntary errors?—No.

3210. Therefore, when you give out to the public that it is published by the permission of the superiors, you do give out to them that it is correct?—Yes; that is to say, we rely upon the editor for its being correct.

3211. You believe it to be correct, and so you give it out to the world?—Yes.

3212. Mr. Newdegate.] I think that the Messrs. Dolman used to publish this work before you did?—I do not know about Dolman; Messrs. Jones did.

3213. Have you seen copies of their productions?—Yes, of Messrs. Jones; I recollect them, but not in connection with our business; I saw them before.

3214. Is that one published by Dolman in 1850 (handing a book to the Witness)?—Yes.

3215. Mr. Matthews.] You observe on the first page the tiara and the two cross keys above "Permissu superiorum," is there any meaning in that?—Not that I know of, only that it is a symbol of the church.

3216. Mr. Newdegate.] This purports to be a number of the Roman Catholic Directory for 1850, does it not?—Yes.

3217. Do you believe that the work existed in that year, and was published by Dolman and Jones?—Yes, I know it existed.

3218. You observe that there is "Permissu superiorum" printed upon that?—Yes.

3219. Therefore it has been the continuous practice of the publishers of this work to print "Permissu superiorum" upon the title page?—Yes, it seems so, from that.

3220. Have you any doubt that that is so?—I do not know whether that is in the next number, or not; because I have not taken any notice.

3221. In this number for 1850 it is, and 1851 it is the same?—I have no doubt that it went on the same.

3222. It is the continuous practice to print it upon the Roman Catholic Directory, of which you are now the publisher?—Yes, no doubt.

The Rev. WILLIAM ANTHONY JOHNSON, called in; and Examined.

Rev. W. A. Johnson.

3223. Mr. Newdegate.] ARE you the Editor of the Roman Catholic Directory for 1869 and 1870?—I am. I have been editor of the Directory for the three years 1868, 1869, and 1870.

3224. Do you reside at 8, York-place, the residence of Dr. Manning?—Yes.

3225. I might ask you have you acted as secretary to Dr. Manning?—Yes, I am one of his Grace's secretaries; but my position as secretary is wholly distinct from my position as editor. The connection of the two offices in the same person is purely accidental.

3226. But you were so, were you not, on the 26th October 1868 when, by direction of Dr. Manning, you addressed a letter to the editor of the "Daily News"?—I think I have been the archbishop's secretary since January 1867.

3227. The date of this letter is October 1868; you wrote that letter by the direction of Dr. Manning?—I suppose that I did; I have no recollection of the letter now. I acknowledge that I have been his secretary since January 1867.

3228. You are responsible, I conclude, for the whole of this work, the Directory, except the advertisements?—No. I beg pardon; I would distinguish: it is necessary to analyse the Directory a little. The Directory for this year, if the index is looked at, will be found to be divided into several parts. Not to mention the Calendar or Ordo recitandi, which relates to the mass and office of each day of the year, there are, in the first place, Parts 1 and 2, viz. from page 1 to 86 in the Directory for this year; and that portion, I may say, consists simply of editorial matter, that is, matter which I have myself collected, and which I have had printed entirely at my own discretion.

3229. Will you be kind enough to read through the preface of the Directory of 1869; it is your own production?—"In the present edition of the Catholic Directory the arrangement of the contents has been slightly altered; and while the size of the book has been kept down by the exclusion of part of the advertisements, a large amount of valuable information has been added. It would have been easy, by lowering the standard of the book, to bring out an inferior directory at a reduced price; but, after submitting the question to the judgment of ecclesiastical superiors, it was felt to be a duty to maintain the present character of the work. For the convenience, however, of those who, in addition to a good almanac, may desire a useful abstract of some of the more general information contained in the Directory, the Directory Almanac, price threepence, has been prepared, of which a notice will be found at page 2. The additional information contained in this year's Directory consists chiefly of the enlargement of its first section, the Catholic and General Almanac, pp. 1–29; the Acts of Parliament affecting Catholics in workhouses and pauper schools, pp. 46–48; a brief notice of martyrs in England, p. 87; an appendix on the Œcumenical Council, pp. 287–297; and an appendix, including the pastoral letter of the archbishop, on the Metropolitan Cathedral of Westminster, pp. 298–313. The only difference between the copies of the Directory prepared for the clergy and those prepared for the laity is this: that in the latter, instead of the Latin Ordo recitandi, prefixed to the Directory, there is a calendar or abridged translation of the Ordo in English. In the compilation of part 3, which is the official tion of the Direct ry, the following rules will til further notice be observed: (1.) When no ange has occurred of the priest in charge of a ssion, the services will be printed as before if alteration be requested by the priest or by e bishop of the diocese; but when there has en a change of the priest in charge, it will be ought better, in the absence of instructions m him, to reprint only the more important rvices of the Sundays and holidays. (2.) The mes of the clergy in the alphabetical list will compared yearly with the returns of priests ceived from their lordships, the bishops; and mes not appearing in those returns will not be tained in the said list, unless instructions be nt each year for their insertion."

3230. That preface is printed according to our directions, I presume?—Yes, printed by y direction entirely.

3231. It indicates certain changes; will you be nd enough to read the preface of the Directory r 1870?—"The Catholic Directory, Ecclesiastil Register, and Almanac for 1870, will be found contain several improvements, when compared ith the edition for 1869. At the end of part , pages 289, &c., is a concise but useful appendix n Œcumenical Councils; and in another apendix, pages 294, &c., an account is given of the resent state of the Catholic Metropolitan athedral Fund. It is, perhaps, well to state hat what may be regarded as the official portion f the Directory, beginning at page 87, ends with age 288. The attention of the clergy is especially alled to an important notice on page 86, respecting the Association for the Celebration of Masses or the deceased Secular Clergy. The difference etween the copies of the Directory prepared for he clergy and those prepared for the laity is only his: that in the latter, instead of the latin Ordo ecitandi, &c., prefixed to the Directory, there is a calendar or abridged translation of the said Ordo in English. In the compilation of part 3 the following rules are observed: (1) When no change has occurred of the priest in charge of a mission, the services are printed as before, if no alteration be requested by the priest, or by the bishop of the diocese. But when there has been a change of the priest in charge, it is thought better, in the absence of instructions from him, to reprint only the more important services of the Sundays and holidays; (2) The names of the clergy in the alphabetical list are compared yearly with the returns of priests received from their lordships the bishops; and names not appearing in those returns are not retained in the said list unless instructions be sent each year for their insertion."

3232. You have read this from a copy of the Roman Catholic Directory?—Yes, this is a copy for 1870.

3233. I perceive that the third paragraph which you have read from the Roman Catholic Directory for 1870 states this: "It is, perhaps, well to state that what may be regarded as the official portion of the Directory, beginning at page 87, ends with page 288"?—Yes.

3234. On page 288 there is a summary of the Roman Catholic statistics of Great Britain, giving a list of the clergy, churches, chapels and stations, religious communities of men, and religious communities of women, that is included I think, in the limits assigned in the summary?—That summary is a summary of what I call the official portion of the Directory; but it has been drawn up entirely by myself, and has not been submitted to the revision of any person whatever; so that I am responsible for the calculation by which I have arrived at those numbers. I am also reponsible for an error of some gravity, which appears to have been brought out before the Committee, in one of the headings of that summary. I have used, and in a general sense I have rightly used, the designation of "religious communities of women"; but with respect to the "religious communities of men," I should have omitted the word "religious": because the number 69, given as the total of the communities of men in Great Britain includes some communities or houses of men who, although they are leading a common life, living, that is, according to a common rule, have not taken any vows, and are not in any sense whatever to be called "religious;" and the word was inserted there by me simply through inadvertence. An instance, of what I mean, are the Oblates of St. Charles at Bayswater, and also decidedly the Oratorians; for it is essential to the idea of religious community, or a religious body, or religious men, that there should be vows taken. If necessary, I could give the very definition from the canon law.

3235. You receive the lists from the bishops of the several districts, it appears?—That requires an explanation. I see now; from the very minute inquiry which is based upon the words I have used in the Directory, that I might have expressed myself in the preface in a way to preclude the possibility of being misunderstood. When I say that the alphabetical list of the clergy is compared each year with the returns sent in by the bishops, I do not mean to say that the bishops each send me an alphabetical list, or any separate list at all, of their clergy. But if the Committee wish to know precisely how my information for part 3 of the Directory comes to me, and what information I use, I can tell them. I base this portion of the Directory, supposing for this year, upon the Directory of the preceding year. During the month of October and the early part of November I receive a large number of letters from all quarters, from the clergy and the laity, and other persons who have noticed any addition that is required, or any alteration that should be made, I then prepare the sheets, and I send the sheets of each diocese, either to the bishop, the vicar general, or the secretary of that diocese; and as the Directory, although private property, is an undertaking of great public utility, I invite them to have the kindness to furnish me with any additional corrections which they may think necessary. In some cases the sheets are corrected with very great accuracy indeed; in others, the sheets are not corrected with so much care.

3236. Mr. Jessel.] They are all returned, I presume?—Yes, they are all returned; and when they are returned, I find additions and alterations suggested here and there. I find, for instance, that a priest, who has been stationed during the past year at a certain mission or church, and who has no idea of the intention of the bishop to remove him, has his name placed by the bishop in another portion of the diocese. This will throw some light upon what I mean when I say that I compare the alphabetical list with the returns furnished by the bishops: that is to say, I see, in the sheets that are returned, a priest of a certain diocese placed for next year at, we will suppose, the church of St. George who has not been there during the past year; I turn to the alphabetical list and, and make the necessary correction in his address.

3237. Mr. Newdegate.] But you use great diligence to render those lists accurate?—I use all the care that I can, although I do not know whether I have any special capacity for the work. I always use all the care that I can; but still, as has been instanced by that error which I have noticed, and which is not of very much consequence, a mistake may escape me.

3238. You have adverted to a misdescription which appears at page 288?—Yes.

3240. I find in several of the lists of the districts, or dioceses, as you call them, those communities of men and women are thus described, "communities of men," "religious houses of men," and "regulars," with respect to the communities of men; and then, with respect to the communities of women, I find that they are entered as "religious communities of women," "convents," and "communities of religious women;" in so far as you have followed the description of those institutions, which you have received from the bishops of the several dioceses, you have no reason to doubt the accuracy of those descriptions?—I do not know that I have any reason to make any statement upon it. I send those sheets, as I say, for revision; and if the bishops, or the vicars general, or the secretaries, were to put down a thing which I knew to be incorrect, and were to request me to have it published, I should publish it, just the same as the printer would print whatever I put into his hands.

3241. That is to say, you accept the authority of the bishops who send you those descriptions?—I adopt their alterations, without pledging myself to the accuracy of them.

3242. Then those alterations and statements are made from the authority of the bishops, from whom you receive the accounts of their dioceses?—I may say that they are made by the bishops, or other revisers, and reproduced by me.

3243. Perhaps it may be beyond your experience, but were you in priest's orders in 1852?—No.

3244. But you had studied the work, I conclude, of which you are now the editor?—I had some information about it.

3245. Are you aware that there is a difference in the form of this work since the number appeared for 1850?—I scarcely know whether the honourable Member means the external appearance of the book.

3246. I mean the whole appearance of the work?—I have made alterations myself. I altered the arrangement considerably in the first year of my editorship, and I made further alterations in the second year, for the convenience of those who used it; and I have also added a great deal of information.

3247. Have you any reason to doubt that this is a copy of the work purporting to be the number for 1850 (handing a book to the Witness)?—None whatever; it has every appearance of it.

3248. That is arranged, I think, according to the districts over which the vicars apostolic presided, is it not?—Yes, it appears to be so.

3249. The work, of which you are now the editor, is arranged according to different districts, purporting to be the dioceses established, I conclude, under the authority of the brief of September 1850?—Yes.

3250. With the exception of the accidental misdescription which you conceive to be in page 288, to which you have referred, you do not feel any doubt that your work is substantially accurate?—That is to say, I have no evidence of any error, or of any error of importance; there may be errors in it that I am not conscious of.

3251. Mr. Jessel.] I think there are 14 dioceses; if you look at the end of each diocese you will see a summary; are those summaries your work?—I came into possession of the Directory, as I say, at the end of 1867, and the first edition was published by me for 1868. The edition was published in this way. I took the sheets of the Directory of the previous year, and sent them to the different persons I have mentioned; I afterwards sent them to press with whatever alterations I found upon them on their being returned to me.

3252. Are the summaries yours, or are the summaries sent you back by the printer?—I think in one case, I do not remember what diocese, the summary was either wholly or in part mine, because I found that no alteration whatever had been made in the summary I had sent for revision; but in other cases I have sent to press what I received, without making any further alteration.

3253. Then, as I understand you, those summaries are sent back to you as they are by the bishops, or their secretaries, or the proper authority of the diocese?—Yes, and printed as they are sent to me.

3254. Therefore they are part of the returns made to you?—Yes.

3255. You told us something about a mistake; will you be kind enough to look at the diocese of Birmingham, at page 134 of the Directory for 1870, near the top of the page you will find an entry, "religious houses of men," and the second line of that entry has these words, "Fathers of the Oratory of Birmingham;" I want to call your attention to this fact, that the bishop of that diocese, or the person who had the supervision of that, has included the fathers of the Oratory amongst "religious houses of men"?—He has inadvertently done so; but I do believe that if it were put to him, and he were pointedly asked whether they really were "religious," he would say, "No, decidedly not." The only sense in which houses of Oratorians could be called "religious houses of men," would be to distinguish them from mere social associations of men living together for civil objects, for secular purposes. The Oratorians are living together to work for the instruction of people, or living for religious objects; but that does not make them religious men, not in the sense se of being "regulars," or "religious," or in sense of being distinguished from secular ests essentially.

3257. I only draw your attention to this, that mistake, if mistake it be, is not merely yours, is the mistake of the bishop of one of the eses?—Yes; or of the reviser.

3258. Will you now turn to page 115, where will find the ecclesiastical statistics of the cese of Westminster, where certain orders described as regulars?—Yes.

3259. And others, like the Oratorians and lates of St. Charles, are left out of the list?— cy are left out of the list of regulars.

3260. But they are also left out of the list of ulars?—Because those who are there men- ned as secular priests, without any qualifying rd, are secular priests who have nothing what- er to distinguish them, even in their mode of e, from ordinary Roman Catholic clergymen; t is, who form no community, and are remove- le from one place to another by their bishop. t the Oratorians are also secular priests, strictly ; and if any priest, who is now living on a mis- n by himself, went and joined the Oratorians, d adopted their mode of life, he would not ase to be a secular priest, though he were to live the rest of his life according to their rules.

3261. The bishop or the secretary of the dio- se, the person who had authority to send back e list, does distinguish the Oratorians and the lates of St. Charles both from seculars on e one hand, and regulars on the other?—But th respect to this diocese, I drew up the list yself: I am responsible for the whole of it; and have distinguished those just named from other cular priests solely for the reason I have stated.

3262. Was it sent back to you?—No, it never ssed out of my hands. Being secretary, I ow a good deal about the state of the diocese, d I did not think it necessary to ask any e to revise that list.

3263. Will you have the kindness to turn to nother diocese, the diocese of Liverpool, at page 7, where you will see the bishop of the diocese ves a summary; I presume that the Oblates ere referred to are something similar to those hich you mentioned at Bayswater?—No, they e different; Oblates of Mary Immaculate are t, I believe, secular priests.

3264. But all those not seculars in this list e regulars, I presume; the Jesuits, Passionists, edemptorists, and Oblates of Mary Immacu- te?—All who are truly so called (Jesuits, Pas- onists, &c.), are, in a seuse more or less strict, eligious and regulars; but I do not give evi- ence that those here called Jesuits or Passionists re really Jesuits or Passionists, &c.

3265. Look at the diocese of Salford, there ou will find the distinction of the priests into hree?—The last is merely a local distinction; tonyhurst is a college.

3266. If I understand you, the distinctions hich you find in some of those places are used ndifferently in different dioceses, "religious houses of men," or "communities of men;" and sometimes you will find under "communities of men," for instance, Benedictines and Dominicans whom we know to be regulars, whereas in other cases you will find "religious houses of men" including all; in fact, those terms seem to be used indifferently, without reference to their accurate signification?—I think it is because they were not used with sufficient thought; if I had been left to my own choice, I should have had one common division for the whole of the dioceses.

3267. Are the missionaries of St. Francis of Sales regulars, or not, do you know?—I scarcely know what they are; I think there are only one or two in England. I know nothing of their rule; I do not know whether they take vows or not.

3268. I cannot myself find any such distinction as you indicate in the Directory, as between the different classes of orders; I presume, as you say, it was by inadvertence that they are mixed together?—Yes: that is, communities of seculars have been inadvertently mixed with religious in one or two instances.

3269. At all events, your attention has not been drawn to it before?—Never by others, I believe.

3270. Mr. Matthews.] There is a distinction, is there not, in your own diocese of Westminster?—Certainly in my own diocese there is a distinction, because at page 115 you have seculars; then seculars unattached, or on sick leave; then Oratorians; then the Oblates of St. Charles, and afterwards the regulars.

3271. Then you there expressly distinguish the order of Oblates of St. Charles from that of regulars?—Yes, I have distinguished them, because I really had absolute control over that page.

3272. You spoke about some official portion of the Directory, but that part of your answer was not finished; could you say what the official portion is?—What I have chosen to call the official portion of the Directory is part 3, beginning at page 87, and ending at page 288; with the exception, however, that that which is on the last page was merely my own composition, and not subject to any revision. I am asked in what sense this part is called official. I do not remember that any editor previous to myself applied the word "official" distinctly to any part of the Directory; but I thought that I was at liberty to do so; partly because the information given in that part refers in some degree to those who occupy an official ecclesiastical position, and partly because I considered that the information generally throughout that portion was collected in an official way. Now, looking at any work, and considering it as to its mode of publication, and the responsibility of its publication, I think the word "official" may be applied to a book in one or other of two senses: first, whenever the matter of any book is collected by authority, and published by order, on the responsibility, and at the expense of that authority, then it is official in what I may call a strict sense; an example of such an official book would be the "British Postal Guide," which is published quarterly, by command of the Postmaster General, entirely on his responsibility, and at the expense of the department. The Directory is not official and no portion of the Directory is official, in that sense. In a second sense, a book may be said to be official, so I apprehend, when the information is collected by a private person, or accidentally by a person occupying some official position, but not acting in his official capacity, a book, I say, is official in this sense, when the information is collected by a private person, under the patronage of a any authority, and with the aid of such information as may be courteously supplied to him, either by the authority itself, or by any other persons whose convenience is in any way promoted by the accuracy of the work. An example of an official book in this second sense is the "Post Office London Directory," as it appears to me; that Directory is stated on its title page to be published under the special patronage of the Postmaster General; but it is printed and published for the proprietor, Mr. Frederic Kelly. I think that that is the sense in which it may be said that the third part of the Directory is to be considered official.

3273. In fact the information which you get from those gentlemen, the secretaries to all the bishops in England, is supplied to you as a matter of courtesy?—Yes.

3274. And they are persons in an official capacity?—Yes. They find it for their convenience to give me the information.

3275. And of course they do their best to make it as accurate as they can?—No doubt the corrections are not all made with equal care; in some cases there are many inaccuracies left unnoticed.

3276. Mr. Newdegate.] I believe you are officially connected with Dr. Manning?—Yes.

3277. And Dr. Manning presides over the diocese of Westminster?—Yes.

3278. I find in page 115 the ecclesiastical statistics of the diocese of Westminster, and I find that the first item is "Secular," and the number is given as 137; then the next item is "Ditto unattached, or on sick leave, 10;" aud then the next item in the list is "Oratorians, 15;" and then follow the "Oblates of St. Charles, 16;" and then come the words "Regulars: Jesuits, Marists, Oblates of Mary Immaculate, Carmelites, Dominicans," &c., but if you cast your eye further down, to the last line but one, you find the words "communities of men, 19," and there is a previous list of those communities of men at page 111?—Yes.

3279. That list, I think, contains these items: "Augustinian Fathers, St. Monica's, Hoxton-square, N. Carmelites (discalced), 5, Vicarage-place, Kensington, W. Charity (Fathers of), 170, Culford-road, Kingsland, N. Dominican Fathers, St. Dominic's Priory, Haverstock-hill, N.W. Jesuit Fathers, 111, Mount-street, W. St. Mary's, Horseferry-road, Westminster, S.W. Marist Fathers, St. Ann's, Albert-place, Spicer-street, E. Oblates of Mary Immaculate, 25, Great Prescott-street, E. Church of the Sacred Heart, Kilburn, N.W. Oblates of St. Charles, St. Mary's, Bayswater, W. Oratory (Fathers of the) Brompton, S.W.:" therefore, in the Catalogue Raisonnée, which is given at page 111, I am right, I believe, in apprehending that the Fathers of the Oratory are classed with the Augustinian Fathers, with the Jesuit Fathers, and with all the regular orders?—They are classed simply as being priests, and observing a common mode of life. Secular priests, who do not belong to any community, live much the same as to rule, as friends living together in a house; they have not necessarily a fixed time for rising or for going to bed, or for coming in or going out; they do in these things almost as they please; they are more like a family.

3280. Are you acquainted with the discipline of the Oratorians?—Only from very general information; I have known something from hearsay but I have never obtained information from themselves about their rule.

3281. Have you not seen their constitutions?—Never.

3282. Are you aware that the Italian courts have decided that they are regulars?—I am not aware of it, and if they have so decided, it is merely because the Italian civil courts have chosen to consider them regulars; but I am not aware of any such decision, and I should not think that any such decision went for anything.

3283. That is only the interpretation of the civil power?—Yes, which I should not respect in this matter.

3284. But you spoke of that which is the official part of this work?—In the sense that I explained.

3285. Being yourself officially connected with Dr. Manning?—But of course my duties as editor, and also my position as co-proprietor, are entirely distinct from my duties and position as secretary. For instance, the Directory is entirely private property; and there is nothing in the nature of the work, no injunction laid upon me by my superiors, and no wish expressed by any superior, which would prevent me, to-morrow, if I chose, from transferring my share in the property to any person; if I wished, even to a layman.

3286. What you have done is "Permissu superiorum"?—Yes, and I will explain what this means. The words "Permissu superiorum" occur on, I believe, one of the sets of copies for this year, the one prepared for the laity. I really did not know, till I saw that attention had been called to it some few weeks ago in this Committee, that the words were there. I certainly did not give any direction as to their being put there this year, and I have no recollection of ever having, during the three years of my editorship, given directions, either to the publisher or to the printer, to have those words put. The words have been put on the wrapper for a series of years, and I imagine that the printer has put those words during these last two or three years simply because they were put there in previous years. I wish to explain what those words precisely mean: I do not know whether the Committee are aware that it is the practice in Catholic countries for persons, even though they are laymen, before they publish anything even on any indifferent subject, to send a copy to the ecclesiastical authorities, saying, "I propose to publish this work, have you any objection to its publication?" And in Rome I have never met with a single book which had there been published without some sign of its having been seen by ecclesiastical superiors. In Rome, and in some other Catholic countries, and also of late years with respect to many books in England, you will find on the book the words, "Nihil obstat," followed by the name of some priest, and then the word "Imprimatur," with the name of a bishop. This means that the book has been looked over by some ecclesiastic, that he has reported to the bishop that he has found nothing against either faith or morals in the book, and that then the bishop has given his imprimatur, which signifies s, "Let it be printed." And it is not necesry that the book should be in any sense whatver a religious book for it to have the Imimatur; it may be a book upon a most indifferat subject, on some subject of science or literare. Years ago the word imprimatur was never ed in England; but persons who wished to ow that a book was a harmless book, that though not an official book it might be read ith a certain amount of confidence, would apply casionally to their bishop, and say, "I intend publish such a work, have you any objection?" nd he would say, "I have no objection; you ay put Permissu superiorum on the title page," nough perhaps sometimes he had never looked it. Therefore I positively assert, with a disnct knowledge of the subject, that the use of e words, Permissu superiorum, does not imply any sense whatever that a book is official, it oes not imply in any sense whatever that a ork has the positive approbation of the periors; it does not imply that the superiors e responsible for the accuracy of its contents; only implies that the superiors have been made ware of the intention to publish the book, and ave given for such publication their implicit or xplicit permission. It shows no more in itself an that a book is harmless, and that people ay read it with confidence that it will not do em any harm, or that they will not find in it ything against faith or morals.

3287. Chairman.] That is your opinion?—hat is my opinion, and that I feel confident is eally the true opinion, so that this form of words, ermissu superiorum might be put to a prayerook, to a book on geography, to a spelling-book, r to child's story book.

3288. But you were not aware that those words ere on the book?—I was not aware that they ere on the book, but I knew that they had been n the work years ago, and I had seen them; was not aware, till a few weeks ago, when saw that it had been mentioned to the Comittee, that the words were on the edition for this ear.

3289. You would not answer for the persons ho originally placed those words on the outside f the book; you cannot tell us what views they ad in placing them there?—No, but inasmuch s I have seen those words permissu superiorum laced on books of various kinds, which have not ad any official appearance whatever, I think it ay be concluded that they were only placed here in the sense which I have explained now.

3290. Would not a person be perfectly justified in inferring from what you have told us that his work is a book of authority?—Persons might nfer it, but I do not think they would be justified in inferring it merely from the words Permissu superiorum; and I know if they were properly informed they would not infer it from those words. I know with respect even to the word Imprimatur, that frequent applications are made to the archbishop for his Imprimatur for certain books; and the application is often refused simply on this ground, viz., that although, as it has been said, the Imprimatur means nothing whatever, except that there is no error against faith or morals, people often advertise it in a way that seems to attach to it an importance which it does not possess.

3291. But what would be the effect if now those words were struck out?—None whatever.

3292. You think that nobody would suppose that there were errors detected in the work, and that the authorities no longer gave it their sanction?—I am sure that it would make no difference whatever, because the work now has established its position.

3293. I think you told us that if you were aware that there were errors in the work, and that the ecclesiastical authorities sanctioned those errors, you would not correct them?—If they were merely errors of designation, for instance. In some cases, where I have thought it of any importance, I have called the attention of the persons revising the sheets to an inaccuracy, and have said, "Would you not prefer that I should express it in this or that way," but at other times I have not thought it at all necessary. Yet if I had had any idea, and if any one connected with this matter had had any idea that the Directory would ever be brought as evidence in any important question, of course every word would have been well weighed.

3294. But you do take great pains apparently to get the sanction of the authorities, and the authorities recognise this work as being the work that you publish under those circumstances?—I cannot say that I take great pains. I send them the sheets partly out of courtesy, and partly because I know that it is in their power to supply me with information, and to correct the information that I have from others. I send them the proof sheets, and I say, "These are the proof sheets of the Directory for next year, and I shall be happy to adopt any change that you wish to notice."

3295. It is more than a matter of courtesy to them when, whatever corrections they may make, or whatever they may direct you to insert, although you may be perfectly aware that there are inaccuracies in their insertion, you insert them in the work?—If there appeared grave inaccuracies in them, I do not think I should. There would be the further question for me to consider and to decide upon, between a mere matter of compliance with the wishes of the bishop and the interests of the book.

3296. Then you qualify the answer which was given a little time ago, I think, that you would adopt any error that you had returned to you?—That answer was given, I think, simply with regard to the question that was put respecting the designation of communities of men, and so forth. It was not an answer to be understood in a universal sense.

3297. With respect to the error which you stated to be one in your opinion, namely, with respect to certain religious communities, that seems to have been returned to you with the sanction of the authorities to whom you submitted it; and we find in it the heading "Religious Houses of Men," but as far as I have understood you to-day, that title is applied to men who are not religious? — Yes, in the summary, certainly.

3298. You say that that is an error; my question to you was whether that was inserted, knowing it to be an error, by you after it had received the sanction of the authorities?—I have no recollection of having adverted to it in any way.

3299. Perhaps you would wish to qualify another answer that you gave with respect to orders of men that are referred to in the work, namely, some who have no connection with religion whatsoever, and amongst those were mentioned the Oratorians?—That is who were not in any sense religious, but simply secular priests.

3300. The words that I took down were, "that were not in any sense whatsoever religious"?—Yes, in any canonical sense.

3301. But I wish to ask whether, in fact, it is not the practice, if it is not strictly a rule of this order, or this body or congregation of Oratorians, that every one of them should be priests?—I think there are some who are not priests. Some are called priests, and some are brothers; the brothers never become priests, I believe; they make themselves useful in the decoration of the altar, I think, and arrangements about the church.

3302. But those who are called fathers are everyone of them priests regularly ordained, are they not?—I think in some cases by anticipation they begin to call one a father before he is a priest; some few weeks before, when he is already in sacred orders; but that simply is a matter of domestic appellation, as I might call it, because they are not really fathers before they are priests.

3303. Is not their purpose strictly religious; take, for instance, the Oratory at Brompton, have they any other object but to propagate their own religion?—All secular priests have the object of propagating their own religion, but that does not make them religious.

3304. But you have pointed, I think, to another order, that had chiefly the object of teaching men which included those that had only the object of teaching as if they superintended education?—I do not remember. I do not apprehend the question clearly.

3305. I thought that you referred to the Oratorians as a class of men who might be engaged in teaching others, as if their purpose might be to superintend education?—I do not remember saying so; but as a matter of fact in London they do not teach at all; their whole work is parochial. In Birmingham, I believe that some of them do teach.

3306. What you mean by parochial duty, is strictly religious?—No; that is, their church exactly corresponds in its work and in the way in which it is conducted to any other Catholic church in London.

3307. Do they preach?—Yes, and administer the Sacraments.

3308. Have they no other purpose?—They have no other purpose than that of simply secular priests; or you may call it parochial work, priests' work, or ecclesiastical work for the instruction, &c., of the people.

3309. And in certain respects they are strictly in relations with the bishop and archbishop?—They are under the bishop; they receive all their faculties from the bishop.

3310. Does he mark out the district in which alone they can act?—Yes, just the same as in the case of any other priests in London.

3311. And they occasionally refer to a superior who may be either in this country or out of this country?—I have no knowledge of their ever referring to anyone but the bishop; I do not know whether they do or not. The bishop has as much control, as far as my information goes, over the Oratorians as over any other secular priests in the diocese, with this exception, that if he wishes to move one of them they would say, "We have built this church and house at our own expense, it belongs to us, and you would not wish to remove us from that which is really our own possession."

3312. Could he not interfere with the mode of administering in their own church?—Yes, he could; he might say, "You must have service at different hours, you must not have so many services, you must preach oftener or less often." And the archbishop could at any time if he thought proper deprive them of any of their faculties.

3313. Mr. Matthews.] The faculty is a permission for a priest to administer the sacraments?—Yes, in a technical sense, depriving a priest of his faculties is depriving him of his jurisdiction.

3314. A priest cannot, I presume, administer the sacraments in the diocese of a bishop without the permission of that bishop?—No; and the bishop can limit his faculties or extend them if he chooses.

3315. I observe that the Right honourable Chairman appears to have misunderstood the sense in which you have used the word "religious;" when you speak of a religious man, do you mean merely of the monastic order?—I mean one of a regular or "religious" order.

3316. It is quite unnecessary, is it not, that a member of a regular order should be a priest at all?—Yes.

3317. A man may be a regular, although he is not a priest?—Yes.

3318. Shortly, a regular is a man who takes the three known vows, and is subject to a rule approved by the Holy See?—Yes. When I use the word "religious," as applied to any community, I use it in its technical sense.

3319. Mr. Pemberton.] As bound by vows?—Yes, as bound by vows.

3320. In your sense, you would consider that a community of priests established for the purposes of prayer, preaching, and the propagating of the Roman Catholic faith, was not a religious community necessarily?—No, not necessarily.

3321. You object to the term official being used with reference to the Directory?—Except in the sense that I explained; in a rather wide sense.

3322. I suppose that it has a very wide circulation amongst Roman Catholics?—It has a good circulation.

2323. And no doubt it is read by the superior clergy, bishops, and archbishops?—They consult it, as it is the only book that contains a clergy list, for instance; the only book that contains the resident clergy in England and Wales.

3324. Have any of the superior clergy objected to the word official, as applied to this book?—No, they have not, not to me.

3325. You have explained to us the use of the word "Imprimatur," and you have said that the words "Permissu superiorum," when printed, are only intended to show that the usual custom has been followed of submitting any book to the authorities, whether on religion or any other subject, and you have also said, I think, that "Imprimatur" has often been refused by the present Roman Catholic Archbishop?—Not often, but sometimes, I meant: and because, as I have seen in newspapers, books are advertised, "with the 'Imprimatur' of the archbishop;" and people sometimes buy them, thinking that this gives them an importance which it does not give.

3326. Do you not think that the appearance of the words "Permissu superiorum" would render der people who are aware of this custom, ble to suppose that this book has been sanc- ned by the authorities?—It might in some y rare cases; but I think the general impres- n on the part of those who saw these words in way in which they are used by the publisher, uld be that the superiors were aware of pub- ation and did not put any objection.

3327. Or at all events would have seen it?— s.

3328. A person would necessarily suppose from ing those words that the authorities had ually seen the work?—Yes, that they had e cognisance of it.

3329. Do not you think that they are rather nger words than the simple word "Impri- tur"?—No, I think not, because "Imprimatur" ans "Let it be printed, I permit it to be nted, I have no objection to its being printed."

3330. Then there is really no difference between words "Permissu superiorum" and the word mprimatur"?—No, I see no difference.

3331. I mean there is no acknowledged differ- e?—There is no acknowledged difference.

3332. Mr. Jessel.] Will you look at page 124, diocese of Beverley, in the "Directory of 1870," ere you will see "religious houses of men, four," uld you tell me whether any of those four, and ich, are not regulars?—Of course I can only ak according to the general designation. I ve no knowledge individually of those par- ular houses; but Benedictines, and all who Benedictines are regular and are religious.

3333. Will you tell me if any of them are not gulars?—I am not sure that any of them are t, because I have no knowledge, of the Vin- ntian Fathers, for instance.

3334. Or the Fathers of Charity?—My impres- n is that Fathers of Charity are; but the ncentian Fathers, I know nothing of.

3335. Do not you know whether they are or e not?—I am not able to say. Of course, I ppose it is understood that in saying this I rely say it with respect to the designation; know nothing of those particular houses, I do t mean to say that this or that particular house a religious house.

3336. At page 135 of the diocese of Bir- ngham, at the bottom of the page, you will d again, "religious houses of men," of those eaking should you say from the designation ly that any of them are not regular?—The hers of the Oratory, one of the three, cer- inly are not.

3337. With regard to the fathers of the insti- te of charity, what would you say?—They are e same as we have just referred to, and I ink they would be understood as religious, but ave scarcely any knowledge of their rules.

3338. If you look at the "communities of men," page 165 in the diocese of Liverpool, are any those not regulars?—I am not sure that any e not.

3339. Of course we pass over the first three, e Benedictine Fathers, the Jesuit Fathers, and e Passionist Fathers, of whom there can be no uestion, and we have then the Redemptorist athers, the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, and e Christian Brothers; could you not say as to em?—No; I cannot say that any of them are ot regulars.

3340. You will find, on turning to page 167 of e same diocese, that they are described as "religious houses of men"?—Yes, but you cannot tell from that.

Rev. W. A. Johnson.

11 July 1870.

3341. If you turn to page 173 you will again get a list of religious houses of men?—Yes.

3342. Do you know about those?—As I have said before, respecting the Fathers of Charity, I have not much information. I am not so positive about them, but Benedictines, Capuchins, Carmelites, are religious.

3343. Mr. Matthews.] Sisters of Charity are not regulars, I presume?—Except in a very wide sense indeed; probably in the widest sense they are.

3344. Mr. Jessel.] Will you turn to page 197, where you will find there again, "religious houses of men"?—I have no knowledge of the first of them, the fathers of Stonyhurst, nor of the Xaverian Brothers. I mean that I have no evidence that the fathers of Stonyhurst are severally and each of them Jesuits.

3345. Do you know whether the Christian Brothers are or are not?—I believe the Christian Brothers do take vows, but I am not certain.

3346. If you turn to page 224, there is again a list of religious houses of men, and we find there the Redemptorists, the brothers of the Christian schools, and the Xaverian Brothers again; I suppose you only give the same answer, that you cannot be certain whether they are rightly described?—I do not know about the Xaverian Brothers. Of course it would all depend upon whether they take vows; if they take vows they are religious.

3347. I mean that the description, "religious houses of men," would not satisfy your mind that they were regulars?—No, it would not.

3348. Mr. Matthews.] As a matter of fact have you ever, since you have been editor, asked any permission for the publication of that work?—None whatever; I could omit the words, "Permissu superiorum," without any difficulty.

3349. The words have been continued from an early date?—Yes, they appear to have been on the "Directory" many years ago.

3350. The old title page has come down just the same as with the tiara and the keys?—Yes; I have no recollection of ever having ordered the words to be put upon it.

3351. Mr. Talbot.] Would it be desirable that the words should be omitted in future?—I think so; I shall certainly omit them, to preclude misunderstanding.

3352. Mr. Newdegate.] Should you feel at liberty, as you are secretary to Dr. Manning, to alter the form of this work without his sanction, and without that of the bishops who contribute to it?—Yes, I could make any alteration I chose; but, of course, if I went too much against the feeling of the people, as to the convenience of the arrangement, or the kind of matter that was inserted, the sale would fall.

3353. I ask you, as being secretary to Dr. Manning, and an ordained priest acting in his diocese, and under his directions, whether, without reference to Dr. Manning, and without reference to any of the bishops who contribute to this work, you would feel yourself authorised to alter it in any manner that might to your own private discretion seem good?—I consider that, as editor and part proprietor, I have absolute control over it, and can alter it in any way whatever; condensing or amplifying the information adding to it, or leaving out whatever I choose.

3354. But would not your discretion be controlled by the position which you occupy?—In no way whatever; it is quite distinct; I do not consider that my discretion as editor is any more controlled by the position that I occupy than if I was a simple layman.

Rev. W. A. Johnson.

3355. Then, in short, your position as secretary to Dr. Manning, and as a Roman Catholic priest, does not at all interfere with your action with reference to these Roman Catholic institutions?—I do not understand what you mean; you mean as editor, I suppose. I think, perhaps, this may be an answer: that it does not at all interfere with any discretion or power which I have as to what I say respecting those institutions as editor.

3356. Should you, occupying the position that you do in connection with Dr. Manning, and as a Roman Catholic priest within his diocese, exercise your discretion in matters connected with the description of one of those religious institutions without consulting him?—I am not aware that I ever consulted him at all on the Directory. The only time when I have consulted him was once, simply as I would consult a friend, respecting a particular mode of expression, or sentence: once in the preparation of the editorial matter, when I wanted to give an accurate definition of what the church understood by indulgences, I went to him and asked him whether he thought my meaning sufficiently clear. I do not remember consulting him in any other respect than that.

3357. You have stated that this publication is official only in the sense in which you have described it, and that it is not official like the "Post Office Directory"?—Like the "British Postal Guide," which is published by the Post Office quarterly; the "London Post Office Directory" is a private publication, with an extensive circulation, by Mr. Kelly.

3358. Is it possible, considering the position of the Roman Catholic church in this country, as a purely voluntary association, that any document issued by any authority of that church should have the same official character as a document issued by authority of the officers of the regular Government established in this country?—Any document issued by any bishop of the Catholic church in England could not have any but a spiritual authority, entirely distinct; and it could not conflict with the civil authority.

3359. In short, it would not have the same legal official authority as a directory issued by the legal officers of the Crown of this country?—If any document were ever to be put forth called official, or intended to be official, by the bishops of the Catholic Church in England, purporting to give official information respecting persons in an ecclesiastical position, I suppose such a document would have its authority, but I do not see much the connection of the question with this subject.

3360. It would have that which you describe as "its authority," but not the authority of law?—No, it would be entirely distinct; we profess not to have any authority over the laws of the country; we wish to be good subjects.

3361. There is that distinction between the authority upon which the Roman Catholic "Directory" is issued, and the authority upon which the "Post Office Directory" is issued?—The one relates simply to matters of society; the other relates to persons who are connected with spiritual work in some way.

3362. And there is a difference, I believe, between the three terms to which you have referred; between the term "Imprimatur," the term "Nihil obstat," and the term "Permissu superiorum"?—The term "Nihil obstat" is always used in connection with the "Imprimatur;" that is to say, according to the custom observed in England and in Catholic countries, the "Imprimatur" is not given until somebody has looked over the work, and has told the bishop, "I find here no errors against faith, and nothing injurious to morals." The bishop then, although the book were in itself absurd and trifling, could, if he wished, say, "Put the 'Nihil obstat,' and I will put the 'Imprimatur.'"

3363. Do I understand you that "Permissu superiorum" is a higher commendation than "Nihil obstat"?—Not a higher commendation. I say that the "Nihil obstat" does not stand alone. "Nihil obstat" and "Imprimatur" always appear upon the same page, but "Permissu superiorum" is not higher than both of them taken together.

3364. But it is equivalent, is it not?—I do not think even it is equal, because when "Nihil obstat" and "Imprimatur" are used, it is a proof that the book has been actually revised by somebody, and that that person has reported upon it to the bishop that he finds in it no errors. "Permissu superiorum" merely means that the superior has had some knowledge of the intention to publish it, and that he has said "You may publish it;" it does not imply that the book has been examined even.

3365. But the fact of your evidence is this, that the materials of this book are supplied by the Roman Catholic bishops, or under their direction?—That is to say, opportunities are given to the Roman Catholic bishops, or to others under them, to make any alterations that they wish in the book that I have prepared for publication.

3366. In that respect you do not depart from the habit of a work which has now existed for many years?—I do not know in what way it was published in former years, but my acquaintance with it is not much more than of four or five years at the most.

3367. But according to your knowledge of this work, have you not found that it has contained previously inaccuracies unworthy of its purpose?—I have no recollection of it now; I may have found them, but I have no recollection of it. I considered some years ago that it was very unsatisfactory from the careless way in which it was got up.

3368. And since it has been in your possession have you not been at some pains to continue its accuracy?—I have taken some pains to make it accurate, but with what success it is impossible for me to tell; I have taken pains certainly.

3369. And in your position, I conceive it would be painful to you to find that there were serious inaccuracies in it—It would not be more painful to me on account of being secretary of the archbishop; it would be simply the same as with anyone else who undertakes to publish any book, and who must needs find it painful, I think, if it is shown that he has not done his work well.

3370. But the fact of your being secretary to Dr. Manning does not render your discovering inaccuracies in the work which you edit less painful?—Certainly not more painful.

3371. Mr. Matthews.] As editor and proprietor of the Catholic Directory, have you authority yourself yourself to strike out the words "Permissu superiorum" on the title page?—Quite so.

Rev. W. A. Johnson.

11 July 1870.

3372. Without consulting the Archbishop of Westminster, or any other bishop?—Yes; and if I do strike them out I shall not say a word to any of them.

3373. Have you authority, as editor and part proprietor of the Catholic Directory, to strike out the list of communities of men in any one diocese?—I can do so if I wish.

3374. For the convenience of the information you insert it; but are you bound by any duty, ecclesiastical or otherwise, to retain that information if you choose to omit it?—None whatever; I might even go so far, supposing I had a pique against any bishop, as to omit all notice of his diocese; but I should ruin the book: and I state this extreme hypothesis of what I am morally incapable of, only to show what an editor and proprietor might absolutely do.

3375. But there is no obligation upon you to print any part of it?—None whatever.

3376. Do you refer to the bishops to correct your proof sheets, as the persons who are best informed as to the work of the clergy in their dioceses?—I refer to them solely in that respect.

3377. Are you at liberty to do with that information, according to your own views of your interests as editor and proprietor of the Catholic Directory?—I am at liberty; it is simply with me a question of courtesy whether I make any change or not.

3378. Chairman.] But you are interested in making it as accurate as possible?—I am interested in making it as accurate as possible.

3379. You could make it otherwise, but that would be against your interest?—I am interested in it commercially, because I am part proprietor.

3380. Mr. O'Reilly.] The honourable Member for North Warwickshire has informed you that what he calls the Italian civil courts (he did not particularise what court or of what place) have decided that the Oratorians are regulars; is it within your knowledge that a law has been passed in the kingdom of Italy, confiscating the property of all the regulars, and that consequently there would be a direct interest in the decision, inasmuch as if that decision was not given the property of the Oratorians in the Italian Kingdom would have escaped confiscation?—I am not aware of what they have done, but I believe if they have chosen to consider the Oratorians as regulars, in all probability they have done so simply to get their money.

3381. Mr. Pemberton.] You do not know anything of the law of Italy?—No.

Mr. Robert Ross, called in; and further Examined.

Mr. Ross.

3382. Mr. Newdegate.] In giving evidence before this Committee with respect to the extracts that you had taken from the poor rate-book, you omitted two properties in deference to a question that I put; I think the last institution with respect to which you gave evidence was the Carmelites, and in your list there were two previous to that Carmelites institution with respect to which you have made extracts from the assessment in the rate-book?—One of them relates to a convent in Bond-street, Chelsea; and under the heading, "Name or Situation of Property," it is designated "The Convent;" the name of the occupier is Selina E. Curtis, and the name of the owner is the same. Under the "Description of Property Rated," it is called a "School and Orphanage." The gross estimated rental is 448 l., and the rateable value is 400 l.; and there is a property connected with it which goes under the same name in every respect, called "The Convent." Selina E. Curtis is the occupier, and Selina E. Curtis is the owner, and it is also called "School and Orphanage," but the value is 112 l. and the rateable value 100 l.

3383. Is that all the information which the rate-book contains with respect to that institution?—This is from the valuation list.

3384. Is that all the information which the valuation list contains with respect to that property?—With regard to these points of that property. It was not necessary, I conceived, to go into all the details of the rating, but to find out with respect to the ownership, occupancy, and the value of the property. All the information given is contained in the valuation list.

3385. Chairman.] Are those certified copies of the entries in the parish book?—In the Valuation Book. In almost every instance, it was intimated to me that the figures, and the other facts in the valuation lists were taken entirely from the rate-book; sometimes it was intimated to me that they were got by sending out special slips, and collecting information in that way.

3386. Mr. Newdegate.] Have you the details of any other institutions?—Yes, I have a number of others; I have an instance of a property in Kensington-square, and if I am to be permitted to give the designation in the Catholic Directory, they are called Sisters of the Assumption of the Perpetual Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. This is rather an extensive property, consisting of Nos. 24, 25 a, 23, and 22, Kensington-square; the occupier is Madame Macnamara, and the owners are reputed to be J. M. Macnamara and others. It is called a house, and the gross estimated rental of No. 24, Kensington-square is 165 l., and the rateable value 138 l.; the gross rental of 25 a, Kensington-square, is 110 l., and the rateable value 92 l.; the gross rental of 23, Kensington-square is 150 l., and the rateable value 125 l.; and the gross rental of No. 22, Kensington-square is 100 l., and the rateable value 84 l.

3387. Mr. Talbot.] Are you reading from the rate-book or the valuation list?—From the valuation list; the extracts were made by my own hand.

3388. Is this valuation list drawn up by the assessment committee of the board of guardians, upon which they make the rate for the relief of the poor?—I understand it to be so.

3389. Mr. Newdegate.] Is that the whole of the information which you have with respect to that property?—No, there is also a number of cottages connected with it.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE CHARLES PELHAM VILLIERS, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. ALFRED SMEE, re-called; and further Examined.

Mr. A. Smee.
14 July 1870.

3390. Chairman.] I BELIEVE that you wish to make some correction in the evidence that you gave here on a former occasion?—I do. I may state, with regard to the dress which I said my relative wore when he came to see us, that I have tried to recall to my mind the exact dress and I utterly fail to recall to mind the exact dress that he wore; but it is fully described in the "Life and Letters of Faber."

3391. When last you were examined, you stated what the dress was that your relative wore when you saw him?—I stated that I thought it was a white dress. My mind was evidently confused by the white dresses I had lately seen abroad.

3392. You found that you were mistaken in saying that it was a white dress, and you wish that error to be corrected?—Yes, I wish that to be corrected in the evidence. I cannot describe the dress from memory, but it is described in this book, and that being public, I think it is of no consequence for me to describe it.

3393. Trusting that book, you believe that what you stated before was an error?—It was an error; and I have inquired at home. My family seem to recollect the dress, as I stated at the time, better than I do.

3394. That dress you then called white; but you have looked into that book and found that that was not the colour of the dress that they wore in the Oratory?—Not the kind of dress that he used to come to our house in.

3395. Mr. Newdegate.] What is the book to which you refer?—"The Life and Letters of Frederick William Faber, D.D., Priest of the Oratory of Saint Philip Neri, by John Edward Bowden," of the same congregation.

3396. When was it published?—In 1869.

3397. Chairman.] The question which you were asked was, "Do you state then that your relative came to you in a white dress?" And your answer was, "It was a monastic dress." Then you were asked, "A white one"? And your answer was, "I think it was white, as well as I remember; it was a lightish coloured one"; is that what you wish to correct?—I wish to correct that; my people say at home, and this book which I have in my hand states, that there was also a cross in red cloth, but I utterly fail to remember it.

3398. But that I do not see in your evidence?—No.

3399. Is there any other error that you want to correct in your evidence?—I understood that on the last occasion, I put in a script as part of the evidence; it was not sent to me to correct, and I do not know whether it was left out; I consider this script (producing it) one of the most important parts of my evidence, and as really belonging and appertaining to it.

3400. Is that a testamentary paper?—The scripts are all the written documents which have to be brought into court when a will is contested.

3401. Then that paper would have been of a testamentary character?—Yes.

3402. Mr. G. Gregory.] Did the judge refer to it in the judgment?—I cannot answer that question off-hand.

Mr. JOHN ANNAND, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Annand.

3403. Mr. Newdegate.] I THINK you are a Clerk, residing in Richmond-street, Edinburgh, are you not?—Yes.

3404. Are you aware that a large amount of property was bequeathed sometime since by the late Captain Peter Mitchell, who resided in Inverleith-row, near Edinburgh, for the building and endowing of an institution in connection with the Church of Rome in Scotland?—Yes.

3405. Mr. Jessel.] Do you know what that instititution is?—Yes.

3406. What is it?—"An asylum for clergymen of the Roman Catholic religion officiating in Scotland, who may be incapacitated by age or infirmity for the discharge of their sacred duties."

3407. Mr. G. Gregory.] Do you know whether the asylum is founded?—Not definitely.

3408. Mr. Jessel.] Do you know where it is?—Not definitely.

3409. Mr. Bourke.] Do you know that this Committee has been appointed to inquire into Conventual and Monastic Institutions?—Yes.

3410. Mr. Jessel.] Do you know where the asylum is?—Yes.

3411. Where is it?—In Perth.

3412. Where in Perth?—Kinnoull Hill.

3413. Mr. Matthews.] I understood you to say that you were not quite sure it was founded; that you only know that indefinitely?—I know it indefinitely.

3414. Were you ever in Perth?—Yes.

3415. Have you ever seen the place?—Yes; I have seen the building.

3416. What makes you say that it is an asylum for for sick clergymen?—Through circumstantial evidence.

3417. Were you never inside it?—No.

3418. Did you ever speak to any of the inmates?—No.

3419. Mr. Jessel.] Do you know anything about the rules of the society, community or anything else on Kinnoull Hill; do you know anything at all about it?—Well, as I said before, I have only the circumstantial evidence.

3420. Tell us what you know about it yourself; what do you know about it?—I only arrive at it from reading the terms of Captain Mitchell's will, and from the building on Kinnoull Hill corresponding somewhat with the terms of Captain Mitchell's will.

3421. You have told us of the terms of the will, and for some reason or other you say that the institution at Kinnoull Hill corresponds with the terms of the will; now have you any other information about it than what appears in the will?—No; at this present moment I could not definitely say.

3422. Now, will you read me any other passage in the will, besides that which you have read, which shows anything about the nature of the institution to be founded?—Yes. "To the bishops of the Roman Catholic Church exercising their functions in Scotland, and including all of their order, whether or not designated as bishops' coadjutors, I bequeath in trust for the purpose aftermentioned, 200 shares, this sum being destined to the special object of establishing and endowing an asylum for clergymen of the Roman Catholic religion officiating in Scotland, who may be incapacitated by age or infirmity for the discharge of their sacred duties. This destination of the sum accruing from the 200 shares aforesaid, being carried into effect by the said right reverend prelates as trustees, hereto specially appointed, on the plan and under the regulations which they may judge most expedient, as decided by a majority of their number; and should there accrue more than they judge sufficient for the purpose specially designated, they shall be at liberty to apply the surplus to such other ecclesiastical purposes as in their judgment may be decided; not less than three bishops actually in office at the time being competent to determine any question regarding the disposal of the property thus bequeathed; and should it be discovered previously, or at the time of my death, that one or more of the legacies bequeathed in this testamentary deed had become lapsed in consequence of the pre-decease of the legatees, the division into 300 shares is notwithstanding still to be maintained, and the amount of the legacies thus lapsed is to be added to the shares assigned as above in trust to the Roman Catholic bishops, whom in this and in all other matters not otherwise provided for in this my latter will, I constitute my residuary legatees. I thank God, whose blessed providence has enabled me to restore to His Church so much of that property of which it has been iniquitously despoiled."

Mr. J. Annand.

3423. Is that all about the institution?—That is all.

3424. Then, as I understand you, you have no information as to the nature of the institution founded on Kinnoull Hill, except that it corresponds with the directions which you have read to us, contained in that instrument or will?—Yes.

3425. Mr. Newdegate.] You are not a member of any monastic institution?—No.

3426. And not being a member, you cannot give information as to the rules or constitution of any such institution?—No.

3427. Chairman.] Can you of your own knowledge, inform this Committee of the correctness of the extract, or verify the extract of that will that you have read out?—I do not exactly understand the question.

3428. You read out some extracts of a will. You were asked what grounds you had for presuming that they were correct, or that the property had been applied or left for the purposes there stated; and you proceeded to state what you had heard of what somebody else had said. Now we want to know whether you can verify them from your own knowledge?—I can certify that that is a correct copy of Captain Mitchell's will.

3429. You have compared it with the original will?—I have copied it from the will.

3430. Can you tell us anything, of your own knowledge, with respect to the application of the property so bequeathed?—No, except the moral presumption connecting the monastery in Kinnoull Hill with the terms of Captain Mitchell's will.

3431. But you have no personal knowledge of it?—No personal knowledge.

3432. Mr. Newdegate.] Where did you obtain access to the extracts of that will which you read to the Committee?—In the Register House in Edinburgh.

3433. Is that a public office?—A public office; a Government office.

3434. You knew something of Captain Michell?—I have heard about him.

Mr. John Macmillan Robertson, re-called; and further Examined.

3435. Mr. Newdegate.] Will you now produce the extracts of the deeds referred to in your answer to Question 2042?—If I remember right, I stated that certain extracts which I expected had been detained in consequence of an accident on the railway, and those are the papers which I have with me to put in. I was asked a question with reference to the properties of Dalbeth and Westthorn, and I think I stated that I was under the impression that a part of Dalbeth was what was included in the valuation roll under the name of Westthorn; but I find that that is not so; that Westthorn is a separate property, and stands upon a separte title, a copy of which I now put in. From this title it appears that Westthorn was disposed to the "Right Reverend Doctor John Murdoch, Roman Catholic Bishop, residing in Glasgow, Vicar Apostolic, in the Western District of Scotland, the Right Reverend Doctor Alexander Smith, Roman Catholic Bishop in Glasgow, the Reverend John Gray, the Reverend John Macintosh, the Reverend Donald Carmichael, the Reverend Donald McEachern, the Reverend Eugene Small, and the Reverend Roderick Chisholm, all Roman Catholic clergymen in Glasgow, the Reverend James Cameron, Roman Catholic clergyman in Maryhill, and the said Reverend Anselm Robertson, and to any other person or persons to be appointed to act along with or to succeed them in manner after-mentioned, and to the survivors and survivor of them, in in trust for the promotion of education in Scotland in connection with the Roman Catholic Church," and so on.

3436. Chairman.] Has that extract been verified?—It is simply a copy made by a clerk; it is not an official extract.

3437. Mr. Matthews.] Have you compared it yourself with the register?—I cannot say that I have seen every word of it; I know it to be correct from having seen the register.

3438. But you have not compared it yourself?—Not myself.

3439. Mr. Newdegate.] Do you believe that those extracts which you now produce are correct?—I am quite satisfied that they are.

3440. Can you give the Committee the particulars of the deed referred to in your answer to Question 1925?—The deed is granted by Doctor John Murdoch and certain other Roman Catholic clergymen in "favour of Eliza Daniel, Dalbeath House, and Ann Keasley, Frances Power, Mary Lowe, Emma Henrietta Rainbuck, and Mary Nordlolon, residing at Hammersmith, near London." The date is 20th of November 1851; the price is 3,250 l., and there are no trust purposes mentioned in the deed.

3441. Are you satisfied that the extract which you have now read is correct?—I have not read an extract, but those are particulars of this deed.

3442. Will you give the particulars of the property referred to in your previous evidence in Question 1883?—That question relates not to the deeds under which the property was acquired, but to the entries of it in the valuation roll. There are four deeds under which the property referred to in these entries was acquired, and they were all conceived in favour of the same individuals. The first was registered on the 7th of February 1866, two upon the 15th of May 1866, and the 4th on the 16th of August 1866. The deeds are all granted in favour of "Alfred Weld, George Porter, and Thomas Porter, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the heirs of the last survivor, as trustees and trustee for behoof of themselves and of the survivors and survivor, and of the heirs of the predecessors," and there are no trust purposes stated.

3443. And these deeds are correctly copied?—I have given a correct statement of what appears on the public register.

3444. And these apply to the property referred to in your answer to Question 1883?—Yes.

3445. This is the property in connection with which you have coupled the name of "the Reverend Alfred Weld and others, per T. B. Parkinson, 40, North Woodside Road;" and the tenant is also stated to be "the Reverend Alfred Weld and others"?—Yes The Committee put certain queries to me with regard to the valuation roll. I have brought with me, for the information of the Committee, two of the forms which are issued to proprietors and tenants; and I think the Committee will find them very serviceable in regard to the answers given, these being blank forms as issued by the registrar (handing in the same.) (The Witness handed extracts from deeds, vide Appendix.)

Mr. Robert Ross, re-called; and further Examined.

Mr. R. Ross.

3446. Mr. Jessel.] Will you look at that printed paper headed "Extracts from Valuation Lists or Rate Books," and referring to the paper, except the last column and the note, will you tell me whether you made those examinations yourself, and whether they are correct?—I did so, and they are correct; may I be permitted to say that I have also compared the last column, and it is as correct as the others, I believe.

3447. The last column is correct according to the Roman Catholic Directory; but you do not understand, perhaps, my meaning; you have connected with the other columns the last column, which cannot be the result of examination but of inference; all the rest is the result of examination?—It is precisely as you say; I have compared this with what appears in the Roman Catholic Directory, and it is perfect.

3448. But you infer the connection; that is not the result of examination, while all the other columns are the result of examination?—I quite understand the honourable Member.

3449. Mr. Newdegate.] Without the Roman Catholic Directory could you have discovered the properties referred to in the other columns?—I could; perhaps not all, but I could have discovered a considerable number of them.

3450. But there were some of these properties that you could not have discovered without reference to the Roman Catholic Directory?—There were some.

3451. Can you point out any of them?—I would require to look over the list a little before I could answer that question; I do not think I could have verified any of those which are here represented as "houses."

3452. Give an instance of what you mean?—Under "Description of property rated," I find the second property under "Kensington" called a "house," and I could not have recognised that as a convent or a monastery, or anything of the kind, unless I had been guided to it by the Roman Catholic Directory.

3453. Is there any other instance?—The four following ones are instances, and there are several others.

3454. Will you give the particulars of them?—Under the "name or situation of property" I find "St. Joseph's House, Portobello Road, Notting Hill."

3455. How do you find that described?—That is, under "description of property rated," called "a house." I could have found out that one; but I may say it is rather conflicting to find out these by merely looking at the list, because in one column you may be able to find out the connection, and in the other you may not; but if the Committee desire I shall be very happy to make out a complete list of those I could not verify without the help of the Romish Directory.

3456. I wish to know exactly which are the properties, for the discovery of which you are indebted to the Roman Catholic Directory; can you supply that to the Committee?—I believe I can, and I will endeavour to do so.

3457. Mr. Sherlock.] You mentioned that you were a student; are you a student of Divinity?—I meant that to be understood in a general sense; I did not wish to go into particulars about it.

Monday, 18*th July* 1870.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Matthews.	Mr. Pease.
Mr. Newdegate.	Mr. Pemberton.
Sir John Ogilvy.	Mr. Sherlock.
Mr. O'Reilly.	Mr. Villiers.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE CHARLES PELHAM VILLIERS, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JAMES ADAM, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Adam. 18 July 1870.

3458. Sir J. Ogilvy.] ARE you a Member of the Scotch Bar?—I am, and have been for 20 years.

3459. Are you aware of the nature and the terms of the inquiry upon which the Committee is engaged?—I am.

3460. And you have been asked by the Lord Advocate of Scotland to attend here to-day to give evidence before this Committee?—Being in London, I was requested by his Lordship to attend to give what information I could to the Committee upon that branch of their inquiry which relates to the state of the law as regards monastic and conventual institutions in Scotland.

3461. Will you inform the Committee what the state of the law in Scotland is as regards monastic and conventual institutions?—I think I shall best do so by referring the Committee to a Scotch Act of the date of 1700, chapter 3, being the 8th and 9th of King William's first Parliament. That was a statute which revived and ratified various old Acts against Papists in Scotland, and it is termed "An Act for preventing the Growth of Popery." Among other things that Act provided, that unless a party should purge himself of Popery by taking and subscribing the formula annexed to that Act, he should not be entitled to purchase property in Scotland; in other words, that voluntary dispositions should become null and void. He was not to be entitled to succeed to heritable property in Scotland, and was not to be entitled to grant gratuitous dispositions of heritages in prejudice of his heirs; and it contains, among other things, this clause, which, perhaps, I had better read to the Committee, as the shortest way of stating it: "That all dispositions, donations, legacies, or other deeds, in favour of cloisters or any other Popish societies, or to any persons to their behoof, shall be void and null in so far as concerns the said cloisters or Popish societies, but the same shall ipso facto fall and accresce to the nearest Protestant relation to the giver at the time when the said disposition, donation, legacy, or other deed were destinate to be effectual." That was the provision which it contained.

3462. Chairman.] I presume that this law is in force now?—I was going to state what has followed upon that law. It continued to be in force till the 33 Geo. 3, c. 44, in the year 1793. That Act substituted the oath abjuration and declaration (which had been previously introduced into England) in the place of the formula appended to the old Act, and it further relieved all parties who took the oath abjuration and declaration from the pains, penalties, and disabilities contained in the old Act of 1700. There was an exception, which is not pertinent to this inquiry, which I need not trouble the Committee with; but that continued to regulate matters in Scotland until the Catholic Relief Act, the 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, was passed, and which was applicable to Scotland as well as to England; and by that, of course, in order to hold property in Scotland, it became no longer necessary to take the oath.

3463. Do we understand that that applied entirely to Scotland; that is to say, in lieu of provision, it was applicable to Scotland as well as to England?—The Catholic Relief Act was.

3464. Mr. Newdegate.] You spoke of the statute of Geo. 3, passed in 1793, which repealed the previous statute of 1700, and substituted what you describe as an oath of abjuration and declaration in lieu of the declaration under the previous Act; is the declaration to which you refer equivalent to what we call the oath of supremacy?—I will show exactly how that stood. The preamble of the Act of 33 Geo. 3, c. 44, proceeds upon the narrative that the oath which had been introduced at that date, or shortly before that date in England, had been found proper and sufficient, and that it was expedient to substitute that oath for the previous formula. I may state, as a Scotch lawyer, that so far as my own knowledge extends, or as far as I can discover from the books, no case has occurred, or is reported in Scotland, bearing upon the construction of those Acts, or upon the matter of inquiry now before this Committee.

3465. Do you mean cases of the violation of this statute enjoining the oath of abjuration and declaration?—There is no such case reported, or any case upon the construction of the statutes, bearing upon this matter.

3466. By subsequent Acts, and particularly by the 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, the Relief Act, which is a general Act throughout the kingdom, was not the oath of supremacy modified in the case of Roman Catholics in Scotland, as well as in the rest of the United Kingdom?—The effect of the 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, was to substitute the oath required by that Act for the previous oath of the 33 Geo. 3.

Mr. J. Adam.

3467. What you have told us has brought us to this, that quoad any oath that might be required of persons in Scotland, it is the same oath that was required by the Relief Act of 1829?—Yes, it is so; or at least, I understand that it is.

3468. Mr. O'Reilly.] Does the change with regard to that oath which was made in England by an Act passed, I think last year, or the year before, referring to the Report of the Commission on Oaths, apply to Scotland?—I think it does: I think it is the same Act, but we have an Act which does make the change in Scotland.

3469. Mr. Newdegate.] At present, whatever may have been the former laws with respect to declarations that may be required of Roman Catholics in Scotland, they are the same as in England?—That is my belief now: that there is no difference between the laws of the two countries in that matter.

3470. Chairman.] You are speaking now of the existing personal disabilities under which a person professing the Catholic religion in Scotland labours?—Yes.

3471. And you state that those are the same as in England; are there any laws affecting the disposition of property in Scotland that differ from those in England?—I was going to say that by the law of Scotland we can, as we call it, mortify a heritable estate for charitable and pious purposes.

3472. Will you explain what you mean by mortifying a heritable estate?—It means to grant or to bequeath in perpetuity.

3473. You have no law against mortmain, I believe?—No; we have no law against mortmain.

3474. Do we understand, then, that there never has been any law of mortmain in Scotland?—Not to my knowledge.

3475. And that property can be devised to be held in perpetuity by corporations?—Yes, by a corporation, or by trustees (if it is not a corporation), for charitable or pious purposes.

3476. Mr. Matthews.] There is no provision, as in England, that there must be a deed executed a certain time before the death of the donor, and enrolled?—No, there is no provision in Scotland; I may also say that there is no provision whereby public charities, such as I am now speaking of, are registered anywhere, nor are they under any inspection by a public officer, or anything of that sort.

3477. Mr. Newdegate.] Neither a public register of the valuation nor register of deeds?—No, in common with all titles in Scotland they are all registered as a matter of title, but it is not necessary that the purposes of the charity should be disclosed on the face of the title, and there is no public officer in Scotland who controls trustees, or inspects trustees, having charitable or other trusts under their management.

3478. Chairman.] Do I understand you to say that, in the first place, property could be devised or granted to be held by a corporation, and not subject to change by death and succession, as in the case of property held by individuals?—Yes, that would be so.

3479. Again, you say that there is no law that restricts the disposition of property on account of its purpose or application?—No, there is no statute; it stands upon the common law, and not upon any statute relating to charitable or pious uses.

3480. You have laws, I presume, that would require, if needed, proof of the circumstances, under which property had been disposed of by will or by deed; alluding, for instance, to influence used at the death-bed?—Yes, certainly.

3481. Mr. Pemberton.] It would be a question as to the validity of the will, I presume?—It would be a question as to whether the party was of a disposing mind, or whether influence was used to obtain the deed or will; of course we have all that.

3482. Chairman.] But you answered the question, I think, to the effect that there was nothing in Scotland corresponding to the Act of George the Second, which applies to England, and I ask if this death-bed law, as I believe it has been called, does not do that, inasmuch as no disposition of property can take effect unless it has been executed 60 days before the death of the person conferring or bequeathing it?—There is no distinction as regards any heritable property in Scotland as regards that matter; the law of death-bed applies to all equally.

3483. Mr. Matthews.] It applies to dispositions in favour of an individual as well as to dispositions in favour of a charity?—Yes, if the granter be proved to be ill of the disease of which he died.

3484. Chairman.] Then persons cannot take property under those circumstances?—No; but there is no exception in favour of one rather than another; it applies to all equally.

3485. Mr. Newdegate.] But are there not certain persons who cannot make a will in their own favour, or direct a will in their own favour?—I do not think that a will made in a man's own favour would be good; but that is apart from this inquiry, as I understand.

3486. The general law of Scotland is different with respect to wills, from the law of England, is it not, as it is different with respect to the registration of deeds?—Yes.

3487. Could you furnish the Committee with the particulars of what is called the law of death-beds in Scotland; what statute is it?—It is no statute; it is common law.

3488. Could you refer us to any cases decided, or law work, which would explain to us the difference which is known to exist between the law of England and the law of Scotland, in respect of death-beds?—I can refer you to the Scotch law authorities which would give that distinction. Mr. Erskine's "Institutes of the Law of Scotland" would give distinctly what the law of Scotland is on that matter; it is an old authority, and our leading authority in Scotland.

3489. Chairman.] But I think that we have understood from you that the purpose of a bequest or gift does not affect the validity of the disposition?—That is so, as a general rule, without, of course, giving any opinion that if the gift is for an immoral or illegal purpose it would be sustained; but that is upon a different ground again.

3490. Can you inform the Committee whether any inconvenience arises from that state of the law?—I have not considered that matter of inconvenience; I came to inform the Committee of how the actual state of the law was, but I am not here to offer any opinion of my own.

3491. Referring

3491. Referring to your experience, we ask if any cases have arisen from a disregard of the law?—There is no case of the kind in Scotland that I know of; no case has arisen before the courts.

3492. May I ask if there is much property disposed of for pious or charitable uses in Scotland?—I have not informed myself upon that matter; but speaking as a mere inhabitant of Scotland, I should say not much, but I am not here to speak at all as to the facts in that matter; I am only here to inform the Committee to the best of my ability as to the state of the law, not to the actual facts about it; I am not here to give any evidence upon them.

3493. Mr. Newdegate.] For guiding cases you would refer us to Erskine's Institutes?— You will find the principle of the law of Scotland as to the death-bed there.

3494. Given in guiding cases?—No, there are many cases since.

3495. By guiding cases, I mean cases by reference to which the law of Scotland and the practice of the courts is now regulated?—There is no decision as to the law of death-bed in Scotland, upon this particular matter.

3496. But the cases which guide the present administration of the law in Scotland are principally to be found in Erskine's Institutes?—No, not cases; Erskine's Institutes will give you the principles of the law of Scotland upon the matter of death-bed. The best place to find the cases is in Shaw's Digest.

3497. Is that published in Scotland, or in England?—It is published in Scotland; there is a very recent edition published last year, in which all the cases upon that matter for the last 40 years will be found.

3498. Mr. Pemberton.] Is there not a book which explains the difference of the law in every point between England and Scotland; I refer to Paterson's Book?—Yes, it does on some points; I do not know whether it does upon this.

3499. You have said what we call the Mortmain Act does not apply to Scotland; is there any law applicable to Scotland analogous to ours with regard to superstitious uses?—No statute.

3500. By the common law of Scotland would a gift to support obits and prayers for the dead be valid?—There is no decision upon that matter; a case has never occurred within my knowledge; the law stands thus, that property may be given for charitable and pious uses.

3501. There has been no decision which says what a charitable and pious use is as distinguished from a superstitious use?—None, to my knowledge.

3502. I think you said that there had been no case at all referring to the subject-matter of this inquiry?—Not that I could discover.

3503. I presume you cannot give the Committee any information from actual knowledge of the extent of property held under such trust?—I cannot.

3504. Chairman.] Have you any reason to suppose that there are monastic institutions established in Scotland?—I have no special knowledge from which to speak upon that subject. I know what is said in Scotland; but that is so very vague that I would not wish to state it to the Committee. I have not informed myself in order to speak upon that matter to the Committee.

3505. But you have stated that the 7th section of the Emancipation Act, the 10 Geo. 4, applies to Scotland?—That is my opinion.

3506. We wish to learn from you if you consider that that law is an operative one, and deters persons of the monastic or religious orders establishing themselves in Scotland?—I am not prepared to speak as to how the fact stands with regard to that; I simply came, being in London, to state what the law was; but as to the extent of the existence of those institutions, or as to what effect the law may or may not have in deterring such institutions from being established, I am not prepared to speak.

3507. Have you never heard of its being put into operation once since its passing in 1829?—As far as I know, there is no case in our books reported upon the matter.

3508. Mr. Matthews.] As I understand you, the statute of 1793 was the first Relief Act to Roman Catholics in Scotland?—It did give them relief, and it was the first to my knowledge.

3509. You also say that that statute refers to the form of the English oath, which had been found sufficient?—Yes.

3510. And that was substituted, I presume, for some oath which Catholics could not conscientiously take, and which was prescribed by the statute of 1700?—It was substituted for the formula in this statute of 1700.

3511. And that was a formula which Catholis could not take without ceasing to be Catholics, and purging themselves of Popery?—That is so.

3512. You have also referred to the English Act, the 31 Geo. 3, c. 32, to which the Scotch Act seems to make reference?—Yes.

3514. In your view, is there any enactment whatever except the Emancipation Act of Geo. 4, which tends in Scotland to render either monastaries or convents illegal?—That is my view, that there is nothing, but there is no decision upon the matter; it is only my opinion.

3515. Then, I suppose, there can be no doubt that under the Act of Geo. c. 4, communities of men bound by vows are illegal?—I should come to that conclusion as a lawyer.

3516. In your judgment, according to the law as it seems to exist in Scotland, are communities of women bound by religious vows, lawful and permitted?—My opinion would rather be that they are legal.

3517. Upon what is that opinion based?—Because I do not think that prior to the Catholic Emancipation Act there was anything to prevent in Scotland the foundation of convents.

3518. Are you aware that the Catholic Emancipation

Mr. J. Adam.

18 July 1870.

Emancipation Act expressly excepts communities of women?—I know it does.

3519. Has it come before you in practice at all, as a Scotch Advocate, whether the legality of leaving property in trust for a community of women can be affirmed; looking at the clause in the Emancipation Act, is it legal to leave or give property in trust for communities of women?—The matter has not come before me in practice; I say that there is very little practice in such matters in Scotland, to my knowledge.

3520. Then you have no opinion upon that subject?—Not from my practice.

3521. Have you in Scotland any rule of law analogous to our rule of English law, which forbids the creation of perpetuities beyond a certain limit, which in England is limited to lives in being and 21 years beyond?—There has recently been introduced a limit with respect to individuals, I think, by the Entail Amendment Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 36.

3522. Do I understand, then, that by the law of Scotland the restriction upon the creation of perpetuities does not apply where the perpetuity is in favour of a charitable use?—That is my understanding of the law.

3523. Has any inconvenience been found to result in Scotland from that general exception to the law, against perpetuity being extended to all charitable uses?—Not to my knowledge.

3524. You have found no public inconveniences result from the want of an Act corresponding to our Mortmain Act?—Not to my knowledge.

3525. Chairman.] Do you know of any instance of the conveyance of property to a religious house or to any corporation, to be held in perpetuity?—There are various hospitals which must hold their lands so.

3526. Mr. Matthews.] When a conveyance is made to a corporation, the corporation must hold in perpetuity?—Yes.

3527. Chairman.] Do you know of any hospital in modern times to which land has been conveyed?—There are various hospitals holding land in Scotland.

3528. There is the great hospital in Edinburgh, Heriot's Hospital; that holds land, does it not?—Yes; Heriot's Hospital holds a great deal of land; and Donaldson's Hospital holds a great deal of land; and there is a still more modern one, Fettis's Institution, which holds land.

3529. Founded within this century?—Yes, it is founded within this century; in fact, the building is just being completed now.

3530. Mr. Matthews.] With regard to superstitious uses, I presume that at one time, and before the Relief Acts, it must have been illegal in Scotland to leave or give money to a priest that he should say masses for the soul of the donor?—Yes, certainly, it must have been so, because all saying of mass was illegal, and both the hearers and the sayers of masses were punished.

3531. Did that illegality result from any statute?—Yes; there were many statutes against saying mass in Scotland.

3532. Have those statutes been repealed?—I think they are repealed.

3533. Can you furnish me with the statutes which prohibit the thing, and the statutes which have repealed the prohibition?—I shall furnish a note of them.

3534. Do I understand that there never has been in Scotland any question raised in court about the illegality or legality of such a bequest as money to a priest to say masses for the soul of the testator?—I can find no such case.

3535. In your judgment that is a legal bequest in Scotland?—I did not say that.

3536. Have you formed a judgment about it?—I would rather not give an opinion upon that matter.

3537. Do you know of anything in the law of Scotland which should make such a bequest illegal?—That is, I think, putting the question very much in the same way.

3538. I presume that the law of Scotland, like every other reasonable law, only avoids a disposition of property where there is some reason for avoiding it?—That is so.

3539. The reason in the sense that I put it to you, must be a reason arising out of some statute, I presume?—We go a very great deal in Scotland upon common law in those matters.

3540. The common law in Scotland, as in England, arose in Catholic times before there were any Protestants?—Yes.

3541. And there could be hardly anything in Scotland which made the saying of mass with a particular intention illegal at common law?—There were the old statutes.

3542. Are there any of those old statutes still unrepealed, which makes the saying of mass, with a particular intention, an illegal act in Scotland?—I do not think that it is illegal in Scotland.

3543. Then a bequest, in order to bring about the doing that act, namely, the saying of mass with a particular intention, would be a good bequest in Scotland?—I have not considered that matter sufficiently to give an opinion about it.

3544. You are not prepared to say that, in your opinion, it would be a bad bequest?—I think it is right of me to say this, that being in London, I was only asked by the Lord Advocate to come before the Committee, and just to state the law as I understand it now to exist, but not its application.

3545. Chairman.] Could you state, from observation, what you believe to be the state of opinion upon this subject in Edinburgh and other places of importance in Scotland, and whether the people are not extremely averse to any of those endowments, whether to hospitals or other charitable institutions?—No; I would rather not state that, because I have no proper information to lay before the Committee.

3546. But if a Lord Advocate should have stated that to the Members of another Committee, have you any reason to think that it would be inaccurate?—I should think that nothing that the Lord Advocate stated would be inaccurate upon the matter.

3547. Mr. Newdegate.] Then the general presumption of the law of Scotland against abuse is, that it relies upon the publicity of deeds by registration?—That is to say, all titles to estates in Scotland are registered.

3548. For the purpose of preventing abuse?—No, as a matter of title; not for the purpose of preventing abuse. It is our way of holding land. All titles to heritable land are registered in Scotland, and nobody deals in land except upon the faith of the public registers in Scotland; but that is merely for matters of credit.

3549. The security to all persons and parties interested erested in property which the law of Scotland ords, is by the public registration of deeds, is not?—That is so.

Mr. J. Adam.

18 July 1870.

3550. And the other security is the practice of courts under what is described as the death- law, which I understand you to be a practice claratory of what I understand to be the com- on law of Scotland?—I cannot say that, be- use in case of any breach of trust, or anything that sort, the matter would be brought before e Court of Session by any party having an terest, and the Court of Session has jurisdiction put that matter right.

3551. And in putting that matter right, it ould correct any abuse that had arisen under a ill?—That would be so.

3552. Mr. Pemberton.] The law is the same in ngland as in Scotland, is it not, as far as that is ncerned?—Except, that I understand that there an official in England charged with seeing that aritable bequests are properly administered.

3553. But as regards the execution of wills nerally and deeds desponing, there is no diffe- nce?—There are some differences as to the anner of execution.

3554. But as far as setting wills or gifts aside n the ground of undue influence, the law is the me in Scotland as in England?—I have no ubt that it is the same.

3555. Mr. Newdegate.] But there are differences n the law directing the mode of execution in cotland?—Yes, there are differences in the mode f execution.

3556. Mr. Matthews.] You say that you have certain provision for the registration of deeds of nveyance and disponing instruments; is it fficient to register the instrument by which a esh title is created without registering the in- trument that declared the trust by which the roperty is held?—That would be quite sufficient give a legal title.

3557. It is not necessary to register the decla- ation of trust?—Not at all.

3558. The system of registration is not directed securing the due or efficient execution of any rust?—It is not for that object at all.

3559. The object is simply to have a public ecord of the title to the land?—Yes, to let people now who is the owner of the land, and with whom s the title.

3560. It does not assist in any way in cor- ecting any trust which may be an illegal one?— It has no such object; but, in point of fact, it hap- ens that trusts are sometimes recorded, and you an then see them if you desire it.

3561. It leads to publicity?—Yes, that is all.

3562. Mr. Newdegate.] It is necessary, is it not, to publish the names of the real trustees in the office in which the deed is registered?—It is necessary to record the actual deed which conveys the land, and of course it has the names of the holders of it.

3563. And the names are published in the deed as registered?—Certainly.

3564. Mr. Sherlock.] Is there any publishing of them, otherwise than entering them in the office?—None; if you wish to have information of the right or title to any land, you can go and search.

3565. I presume that is under the particular statute for the registration of deeds in Scotland? —It is so, but it is not often had recourse to.

3566. Mr. Pemberton.] Nobody looks, except those interested in the property?—No.

3567. Mr. Sherlock.] Is the registration impe- rative, that is to say, is there any Act making it imperative that every person should register every deed under which he purchases?—Not the least; but if you do not, a second grant first registered would be better than the first grant last registered; and of course everybody at once puts his deeds on the register.

3568. Are you aware that the same thing exists in Yorkshire, in Middlesex, and in Ireland also? —Yes.

3569. You are not bound, I believe, to state the precise consideration upon which the pur- chase is made?—No, not the least.

3570. And it has nothing to say to monastic institutions at all?—Nothing whatever.

3571. With regard to this death-bed law, that is the common law of Scotland, as I understand you?—Yes.

3572. It vitiates ipso facto a disposition within a certain time before death?—Yes; a deed exe- cuted within 60 days of death by a man on death- bed, and when ill of the disease of which he died, is vitiated, no matter whether he be of sound disposing mind, or not.

3573. And it is not a question, as I under- stand you, of undue influence, or otherwise?— Not the least.

3574. Or as to the state of his mind, but it is a question of time?—It is a question of time.

3575. Mr. Matthews.] The limit of time is substituted for an embarrassing inquiry, whether undue influence was exercised?—No doubt that was the object of it.

3576. Mr. Sherlock.] That being so, the only consideration would be, how long before the time of his death the deed was executed?—Yes, it would be a totally different ground of reduction from that of a deed on the ground of undue in- fluence.

Mr. William Gray Farmer, called in; and Examined.

Mr. W. G. Farmer.

3577. Mr. Newdegate.] I think you are a resident at Hinckley, in Leicestershire?—Yes.

3578. And three or four years ago you were chairman of the board of guardians?—I was for two years.

3579. And since then you have been on a com- mittee of ratepayers and guardians who made a valuation of the parish of Hinckley?—It was about that time.

3580. And this valuation, although revised by the assessment committee, is still in use?—It is still in use, but it is revised from time to time.

3581. I will ask you whether you are not aware that there has been a sale of property recently at Hinckley, belonging to certain priests who are resident in an establishment called the Priory, at Hinckley?—I was at the sale myself.

3582. I think you had one of the catalogues? —Yes; it was in June 1869.

3583. Are you cognisant of the property of which part was sold under that catalogue?—Yes, I know nearly every lot there.

3584. Have you referred to the valuation list, and can you state the property to the Committee, and then point out the parts that were sold; and first, will you state the property belonging to those priests?—Yes, I will do so.

3585. Chairman.] Were you present at the sale?—Yes.

3586. And you know the property?—Yes; I know the property.

3587. Mr. Matthews.] Have you seen the title-deeds?—Two lots of title-deeds I have.

3588. Where are those deeds; in whose possession?—Two lots of deeds have been in my possession as trustee of the benefit building society, who advanced part of the money.

3589. Mr. Newdegate.] Will you read from the valuation list the description of this property, giving the name of the reputed owner, and the aggregate extent of it?—The particulars from the rate-book refer only to that property which is still in their possession; the property which has been sold I have not mentioned, but I can explain anything from that sale paper.

3590. What name appears in the valuation list as the reputed owner of the property which you ascribe of your own knowledge to the inhabitants of the Priory?—The Reverend F. O'Brien is the owner.

3591. He is a priest, is he not?—Yes, he is a priest.

3592. And a resident in the Priory?—Yes, he is a resident in the Priory.

3593. What is the extent of that property?—The first lot which appears in the rate-book is of the extent of 18 acres, situated in Hinckley. Then there is a house and a garden belonging to the Priory; the Priory itself, and a school-room and a garden, of all of which properties the owner appears as the Rev. F. O'Brien, and also he is put down as occupier; and then there are 11 or 12 cottages almost adjoining the Priory occupied by different individuals, but the Rev. F. O'Brien is the reputed owner of each of those properties. There is also a farm in the parish of Hinckley, containing about 133 acres, which I know very well myself.

3594. As you assisted in making that list, what is the value of that property?—The rental of the farm, I believe, is about 26 s. per acre. I knew the late tenant very well.

3595. What is the gross value entered in that list?—£. 297 15 s. is the gross value of the Hinckley property still in their possession.

3596. Chairman.] Is that the gross estimated rental?—Yes, the gross estimated rental.

3597. Mr. Newdegate.] Then there is a property in Burbage, the adjoining parish, is there not?—Yes; there is a property in Burbage, at present in the occupation of John Bates; and the Rev. Nickolds appears as the owner.

3598. Is that the whole of the property of which you have an account?—No; this is only one portion of the property in Burbage; there is other property in Burbage besides that.

3599. Which you have not here?—Yes, I have; there is a farm occupied by Thomas Record, and the same owner appears, the Rev. Nickolds, which farm is 82 acres in extent. There is a farm also in Burbage, now and for some time past occupied by Mr. Edward James, but it has just been sold to Sir John Hartopp; that is 84 acres. I know the property myself, and have been over it.

3600. That was sold by private contract, was it not?—Yes, very recently.

3601. Mr. O'Reilly.] Do you know whom it was sold by?—I believe it is sold by the same parties who were the vendors in the other case.

3602. Mr. Newdegate.] Is there any other property that you have to mention?—I have given you the property in Hinckley, and the gross estimated rental of the Burbage property remaining unsold is 180 l. 3 s. 6 d.

3603. Mr. Matthews.] Is the copy of the valuation list which you hold in your hand, made by yourself?—Yes; it was made on my own counter from the rate-book.

3604. Mr. Newdegate.] Is there any other property to which this catalogue of sale does not refer?—Yes, the other property in Hinckley, which I have mentioned, is not included in that.

3605. Have you stated all the property except this, which was the subject of sale under this auction?—Yes, I believe I have.

3606. And the property sold to Sir John Hartopp?—Yes, I believe I have.

3607. Will you take that advertisement in your hand (handing advertisement to the Witness); that is an advertisement of the sale; when did that sale take place?—It took place on the day mentioned here, on the 15th of June 1869.

3608. And you were present at that sale?—I was present.

3609. And you are well acquainted with some of the purchasers?—Yes; I know them all.

3610. And they all understood, and you understood, that it was a sale of what was called commonly in that district the Priory land?—Belonging to the priests; that is what we understood; and one of the priests was present.

3611. Do you know who was present?—I believe it was Mr. Nickolds, of Leicester.

3612. You saw him, and you believe him to have been Mr. Nickolds?—Yes.

3613. With respect to this Priory, I believe Mr. O'Brien is the only resident priest at present?—At present he is.

3614. But formerly, you have known 20 other inmates of that Priory, have you not?—There were that number.

3615. Were they principally young men there for education?—Yes.

3616. Do you know what kind of education?—No, I do not.

3617. Does it so happen that some of the title-deeds of this property have come into your possession?—It does, as trustee of the benefit building society who lent a part of the purchase-money on mortgage.

3618. Can you state the name of the vendors that appear in those deeds?—In the case of the first lot, of which the purchaser was Alcock, the names of the vendors are the Rev. James Aylward, of Newcastle, formerly of Hinckley; W. Nickolds, of Leicester; J. Maltus, of Stone, formerly of Hinckley; and Edward Williams, formerly of Stone, but now of Newcastle. Those names appear as vendors on the deed.

3619. And all those were priests?—I believe so; I know Mr. Maltus, and I know Mr. Aylward; they were in Hinckley. I know them perfectly well.

3620. Mr. Pemberton.] Are they all described in the deed as reverend?—Reverend and clerk.

If

it is necessary, I have one of the deeds with 3621. Mr. Newdegate.] Will you be kind ough to read the names of the vendors in that ?—"Between the Rev. James Aylward, merly of Hinckley, in the county of Leicester, now of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in the county Northumberland, clerk; the Rev. Francis nt, also formerly of Hinckley aforesaid, but w of Stoke-upon-Trent, in the county of Staf- l, clerk; the Rev. William Nickolds, of Lei- r, in the said county of Leicester; and the . Edward Williams, formerly of Stone, in the county of Stafford, but now of Newcastle- n-Tyne aforesaid, clerk." They are the four rties mentioned in the deeds of lot 3 in the talogue.

3622. Mr. Sherlock.] What is the property nveyed by that deed; what is the amount in reage?—The purchase-money was 872 l. 16 s., clusive of timber; the purchaser at the sale as Thomas Ginns, but it was afterwards sold to r. Francis Drake.

3623. Mr. Pease.] Are those parties described trustees for anybody?—I have not read beyond at.

3624. Mr. Sherlock.] Did your society advance oney on mortgage for the purpose of building on this land?—Not for building or otherwise; e have advanced the money, and that is the ason we have the deed.

3625. Mr. Newdegate.] Will you be kind ough to state the names of the vendors in the ther deed?—That is the deed referring to the roperty brought by Ginns. I have handed in ne names of the vendors in Alcock's case; these e the only two lots I have; the Rev. James ylward, the Rev. W. Nickolds, the Rev. J. Maltus, and the Rev. Edward Williams; and here is one other name in this case, the Rev. Mr. Dent, which is different.

3626. Will you be kind enough to take into our hand a copy of the Roman Catholic Direc- ory for the year 1870, and see whether there is ot this paragraph in page 131, under the head of Convents. "Stone. The Immaculate Conception nd St. Dominic (3rd May 1854); Rev. James A. Maltus, F. W. D. Trenow, and Hyacinth Philip Arden; Sunday, Mass at 8, High Mass at 10½, Catechism at 3," and so on. I ask you whether he names in this paragraph are not the same names as those of the vendors in the sale to which your evidence refers?—I should believe them to be so.

3627. Chairman.] How did you come by those deeds?—I happen to be one of the trustees of the society, which has furnished part of the money for the purchase of the property.

3628. Whom did you furnish the money to?—To the person who bought the property.

3629. Mr. Pemberton.] I suppose they deposited those deeds with your society when they borrowed the money?—Yes.

3630. Mr. Newdegate.] I wish to call your attention to a paragraph at page 101 in the Roman Catholic Directory for 1864, and I wish to know whether this paragraph refers to any of the persons connected with this institution and with the sale. "Hinckley; St. Peter's Priory (1824); Very Reverend F. R. Dom. Trenow, vicar; Reverends F. F. Francis O'Brien and Piers Cavanagh, O.S.D." Do those names correspond with the names that you have now connected with this property?—I believe it does refer to some of the persons mentioned in the deeds.

3631. Mr. O'Brien is at present resident in the Priory?—He is.

3632. Do you remember Mr. Trenow?—I do.

3633. As a resident in the Priory?—Yes, I do.

3634. From your knowledge, do you understand that those parties were virtually joint owners of this property?—I believe it is so.

3635. At all events, the names appear as vendors of part of this property?—Yes, I believe it to be so.

3636. Mr. Pemberton.] You say that you were present at the sale; was it stated at the time of the sale who the vendors were?—I presume the conditions would be read, and the names would be the same in the conditions.

3637. You have not got the conditions with you?—No, I have not the conditions with me.

3638. Do you remember any of the conditions?—I do not know that I remember them, but I believe the same names were read over as the vendors as occur in the deed.

3639. Do you remember whether it was stated in the conditions of sale that the vendors were trustees?—I do not remember that; I had no object in attending the sale in particular.

3640. Mr. Newdegate.] Can you supply the conditions of sale?—Probably, I could.

3641. Will you do so if you can?—I will.

3642. Mr. Pemberton.] You are not lawyer enough to know whether the covenants in that deed were trustees' covenants or ordinary covenants?—No, I am not a lawyer at all.

3643. Mr. O'Reilly.] Do you know whether or not certain names which you have read out of the Catholic Directory belong to the same persons as certain names which you have read out of that deed?—I believe them to be so.

3644. I must repeat my question. Do you know it of your own knowledge?—I knew Mr. Maltus, I knew Mr. Trenow, and I knew Mr. Aylward, and I believe them to be the same persons as are mentioned in the deed; I cannot say more than that.

3645. Do you know of your own knowledge that those persons to whom those names in the Catholic Directory refer, are the same persons whose names appear in the deed?—I believe them to be the same persons; I cannot say beyond that.

3646. Do you of your own knowledge know it or not?—I believe them to be so, but beyond that I cannot say.

3647. Will you give me the ground of your belief?—I believe them to be so; they were resident in Hinckley, and they are mentioned in the deeds as being formerly of Hinckley; and they were living in Hinckley, I know.

3648. How do you know that the persons whose names you have read out of the Catholic Directory are the same persons whom you knew?—I can only say what I have said before, that I have seen several of them living in Hinckley.

3649. Several of whom?—Of the vendors in that deed; for instance, Mr. Aylward.

3650. How do you know that the several persons named in the Catholic Directory were resident there or not?—Mr. Aylward, I knew him, and he was resident in Hinckley.

Mr. W. G. Farmer. 18 July 1870.

3651. You know that he is the person whose name appears in the Directory?—I believe him to be so; I have not seen the Catholic Directory before; I am not at all conversant with it.

3652. Mr. Pemberton.] Do the Christian names and the surnames correspond?—Yes, they do correspond.

3653. Mr. O'Reilly.] Do the Christian names and the surnames of those two sets of names correspond or not?—Yes, I believe they do.

3654. And with regard to those gentlemen whose names you have given in as the vendors, the Rev. Mr. Aylward, the Rev. Mr. Nickolds, the Rev. Mr. Maltus, the Rev. Mr. Williams, and the Rev. Mr. Dent, who are described in that deed which you have read as Reverend, and clerks, do you know whether any of them are members of a monastic or conventual institution?—I believe them to be so.

3655. Will you give the grounds of your belief?—Mr. Maltus is at Stone, and that is, I understand, a convent.

3656. Mr. Matthews.] Have you ever been at Stone?—Yes, and Mr. Williams also was at Stone: I am not prepared to say beyond that.

3657. Do you know that the building where those gentlemen as you state, reside, is a convent or not?—It is reported to be so; I have not been in the interior.

3658. Have you any more reason, or can you assign any other reason than report, for believing it to be a convent?—The description, I believe, is given as a convent at Stone.

3659. What description?—It is described in Stone as a convent; I do not know beyond that; I have only seen the exterior of it, and I should judge it to be so from the appearance of the building.

3660. Do you know whether any other of the persons connected with this property as owners or vendors are members of a monastic institution?—No; not beyond the names I mentioned.

3661. Sir John Hartopp, for instance?—Sir John Hartopp is the purchaser of a part of the property.

3662. But it might have been purchased by a member of a monastic institution?—I know Sir John Hartopp.

3663. Do you know whether he is a member of a monastic institution?—He is not.

3664. Mr. Pemberton.] You perhaps know that he is a married gentleman?—I know he is a married gentleman.

3665. Mr. O'Reilly.] Is Mr. Ginns a member of a monastic or conventual institution?—No, he is not.

3666. With regard to those gentlemen whom you say you believe to be monks, have you any more certain knowledge that they are monks than that those other gentlemen are not monks?—May I ask whether it is understood that a monk performs the regular duty of a priest; if so, I should believe them all to be monks.

3667. Then am I right in conceiving that one of your reasons for believing them to be monks is that they perform the ordinary duties of a priest?—Yes; that is part of my reason.

3668. Mr. Matthews.] Have you ever examined the Catholic Directory before to-day?—No.

3669. It was shown you for the first time by the honourable Member for North Warwickshire?—Yes.

3670. You produce the deed in which the Reverend Francis Dent is the vendor?—Yes.

3671. And you are shown a page of the Catholic Directory which speaks of the Reverend Francis Aloysius Dent; what reason have you for saying that the Reverend Francis Dent and the Reverend Francis Aloysius Dent is the same person?—Their residence is the same; it is described here as Stoke-upon-Trent.

3672. Why is Francis Dent and Francis Aloysius Dent the same person?—I am not a lawyer to give a judgment upon that; I believe that they are the names of the same person.

3673. That is your reason for believing that the Reverend F. Dent and the Reverend F. Aloysius Dent are the same person?—Because he is described here in the deeds as of Stoke-upon-Trent; and he is there in the Directory as residing at that place.

3674. Is there no other Francis Dent at Stoke-upon-Trent?—Probably not; I do not think it probable that there would be two brothers named Francis.

3675. One is F. A.; how do you account for the difference in the name?—I cannot account for it.

3676. You think it is an accident?—I must leave that for you to decide.

3677. What made you assent to the honourable Member for North Warwickshire, that the Reverend F. A. Dent is the same as the Reverend Francis Dent?—Simply because he is described, as I have previously mentioned, both in the deeds and the Directory as being at Stoke-on-Trent, and I believe it is the same person.

3678. I see that the property that is sold to Mr. Ginns appears to have been bought by Messrs. Dent, Nickolds, Williams, and Aylward in 1863?—Yes.

3679. And sold again by them to Mr. Ginns in 1869?—Yes; I remember the purchase.

3680. Will you tell me when the other property was bought by the vendors, which will appear by the recital; I mean the second property that you mentioned, which was sold by Messrs. Aylward, Nickolds, Maltus, and Williams?—I have not got the deeds of the second property; but they are in my possession.

3681. Can you tell me when the gentlemen who sell the second property purchased it?—I am now referring to the property of Alcock, and I do not know when it was purchased by the priests.

3682. You do not know whether they held it as short a time as the other?—They held it for some years; I do not know the precise time.

3683. Does it appear from this deed which you have produced that the four gentlemen named were the absolute owners?—I am not a lawyer, and I cannot pretend to say; I only know that they are the vendors.

3684. Do you object to my reading so much of the deed as shows that they are the vendors?—No, I do not object.

3685. This deed recites, that whereas by an indenture of the 17th day of February 1854, Baker and others sold to Aylward, Morewood, Dent, Nickolds, and their heirs, and then that in 1863 the same premises were conveyed to Aylward, Dent, Nickolds, and Williams, and their heirs and assigns for ever, as joint tenants both in equity and in law. Those four gentlemen absolutely to Mr. Ginns, do they not?—They believe.

3686. Where in your valuation list does that perty appear which was sold to Mr. Ginns?—ve not put it down.

3687. Where does it appear in that copy of the -book?—It does not appear at all, because are different owners and different occupiers 3688. Is that part of the same property, the ainder of which is now in the rate-book?—, certainly.

3689. It appears by the rate-book that the Rev. ncis O'Brien is the owner of the whole?—Is reputed owner.

3690. Was he also the reputed owner of those r lots which you know were sold, one to a Mr. ns, and the other to Mr. Alcock?—I believe name appeared in every case.

3691. Did his name appear as the reputed er also of the lots which have been sold, and hich you have the deed?—I believe so.

3692. Did you yourself make out and fill up columns in the rate-book, containing the es of the owners and occupiers when the iation was made?—I did not fill them up; have a rate collector who does that.

3693. It was filled up by your rate collector? es; and who is also the assistant overseer.

3694. Have you any knowledge from whom rate collector or the assistant overseer got information which he inserted in this column wners and occupiers?—He goes at once to parties interested in the property, and gets names.

3695. Have you any knowledge in this partiar case where he got it?—No; excepting ng to the persons themselves; I do not know t he did, but it is necessary to have the proper ne in the rate-book.

3696. But it happens in this case that it is the ong name in the rate-book?—No.

3697. Have you not told us that the name ntioned in the rate-book is the Rev. F. Brien?—Yes.

3698. Does it appear in the recital of the deed t the names are the Rev. Messrs. Aylward, nt, Nickolds, and Williams?—It appears to ve been the custom that the priest in residence the time being, is put down as the owner in rate-book.

3699. Although he was not the owner?—Alough he might not be the owner.

3700. Then in one case that you have given us materials for accurate knowledge of, the Rev. O'Brien was not the owner?—I say his name in the rate-book, but he does not appear as the ndor.

3701. But it appears that some other persons re the owners and vendors?—Yes.

3702. You have talked about the Priory, but u yourself in the rate-book have described the iory as "school and offices"?—There are two tinct lots; there is the Priory, and there is ool and offices. It is the assistant overseer's ce to get the proper names and the proper scriptions of the property.

3703. It is described as "school and offices"? Yes; part of it is.

3704. Is there a school and offices attached to ?—There is a "school and offices" to which I ve before referred, which is returned as void, 0.92.

but there is a small school not immediately adjoining the Priory.

3705. Is that the school in which the 21 inmates were formerly taught?—Probably a part of it; there are plenty of rooms in the Priory, and the school and offices are connected with it.

3706. Mr. Newdegate.] Are you not now churchwarden of Hinckley?—Yes; and I have been so for three years.

3707. Is it not part of your duty to sign the rate-book?—I believe I have signed nearly every rate that has been granted for the last three years.

3708. Do you take the usual precautions for the accuracy of that rate-book?—It is left with the overseer, and any ratepayer may look through it.

3709. Do you believe that it is generally accurate, and according to the usual form?—I believe it to be so, for this reason, that it is necessary to have the names properly inserted as the occupiers, because if the rate is to be recovered by law you must show that they are the right parties in the book.

3710. Chairman.] I suppose the valuation lists are submitted to the assessment committee?—Yes.

3711. And they are always placed in some public place where they can be inspected?—Yes, at any reasonable time.

3712. The overseer is the public officer appointed to prepare the lists, is he not?—Yes; and subject to the authority of the Poor Law Board.

3713. And he is responsible for the valuation list when he submits it to the assessment committee?—He is.

3714. Mr. Newdegate.] In short, as churchwarden, you have signed those lists on the usual assurance of their accuracy?—Yes, I have.

3715. Mr. Sherlock.] As I understand, you became acquainted with the particulars of this property, as being trustee for a society that advanced money to the purchaser?—Not at first. I have known the property for years. I have lived in Hinckley all my life, and have known the property all my life.

3716. And have you known the nature of the tenure all your life?—No, I cannot say that.

3717. Was it not with reference to the nature of the tenure that you became acquainted with it in your character as trustee for this building society?—No, I say this; that those properties have always been understood to be belonging to the priests for some years, and when the property was sold the deeds came into my hands. I knew the property before, and it was supposed to be the priests'; years before that sale, it was known as the priests' property.

3718. Have you got the title-deeds of this property in your possession?—Of the two lots that were sold out of the eight lots, not beyond those.

3719. Mr. Pemberton.] Have you any of the earlier title-deeds?—I have the earlier title-deeds referring to that property.

3720. Mr. Sherlock.] Have you the earlier title deeds of the property upon which you advanced the money?—Yes; these are out of the bundle of deeds.

3721. Have you got all the title-deeds deposited with you of the properties upon which you advanced money?—Yes.

3722. It is the custom of your society, is it not, not to advance money without getting a deposit of the title-deeds, and a mortgage as well?—Yes, we expect to have a mortgage security.

Mr. W. G. Farmer.

18 July 1870.

3723. Have you not got, with reference to the particular property on which you advanced money, all the title deeds of that property?—Yes, I suppose we have them all.

3724. The rule, of course, of your society is, as far as possible, to insist upon having the title-deeds lodged with you, and a mortgage executed to secure you the amount which your society has advanced?—Yes, certainly.

3725. In that way can you tell us, not from hearsay or otherwise, but from actual knowledge, anything of the tenure of any of this property antecedent to what is stated in this deed?—No, I do not know that I can.

3726. Mr. Pemberton.] Have you any of the earlier title-deeds with you?—No, I have not.

3727. Mr. Sherlock.] Do you know anythin yourself of the nature of the tenure of th property?– It is rather a legal question, and am not a lawyer; I do not understand the leg part of the business at all.

3728. As you have been living at Hinckle for some years, you know that there were pries living there, and you believe that they were th proper parties who were owners of this property —I do.

3729. But anything as to the legal mod in which they have held their property, yo know nothing about it, not being a lawyer?— do not.

3730. Chairman.] You are satisfied with th title yourself, and you took it as a security?— Yes; our solicitor passed it as being good; an we were satisfied as trustees.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE CHARLES PELHAM VILLIERS, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. WILLIAM FORD, called in; and Examined.

Mr. W. Ford.

21 July 1870.

3731. Chairman.] I BELIEVE you attend here to-day on behalf of some religious institutions; I do not know whether they can be called of a conventual character, but they are religious in their character, and are supposed to be somewhat resembling the convents or monasteries which are the more immediate subject of our inquiry?—Yes; I am the Solicitor of All Saints' Home, No. 82, Margaret-street, Cavendish-square.

3732. Do you represent any other institution?—I do not now. I was for 20 years the Honorary Solicitor for the Clewer House of Mercy, near Windsor; I wish to say that I am the Honorary Solicitor to the All Saints' Home. I do not receive any remuneration whatever for my services.

3733. Will you inform us what is the object and purpose of this institution?—I think I may say that we are most ready to give every information that is desired to be received by this Committee, or by any member of the Committee. There is nothing to conceal, and any attempt to disguise anything, or to conceal anything, would leave an impression that there was something to conceal; and we desire to speak, in a plain and open way, everything that we know, and I am sent here for that purpose. The object of the institution is "the reception and maintenance of incurables, and aged and infirm persons in destitute circumstances, and orphans; the visiting and nursing of the poor and sick, and the relief of their spiritual and temporal wants; the burial of the dead, and the exercise of other works of mercy; and the said society shall consist of a superior and sisters, and shall be assisted by trustees, an auditor, and a chaplain, and such other officers as the superior and sisters shall hereafter think fit to appoint."

3734. Do we rightly understand you that these people live together in community?—Yes. You will understand that I am not able to speak very well of what happens inside the house; but as far as I know, they live together in community.

3735. In the first place, I suppose it is one building?—There were two or three houses thrown into one; it is practically one building, and under the care of one superior.

3736. It is an institution for women entirely, is it not?—For women entirely.

3737. There is a superior, and how many sisters?—I do not know how many sisters there are.

3738. You do not know whether they are limited in number?—They are not limited in number by the statutes, a copy of which I hold in my hand.

3739. They have rules for the management of the society?—Yes, there are statutes, of which I have a copy in my hand, and the original of which is in the room.

3740. And are these statutes sanctioned by any ecclesiastical authority?—Yes, by the present Archbishop of Canterbury, who was constituted by one of their rules their visitor; he was Bishop of London at the time. The second rule says, that the Right Honourable and Right Reverend Father in God, Archibald Campbell, Lord Bishop of London, is the first visitor.

3741. Has he sanctioned the rules under which they live, or did he give them to the society?—I was not the solicitor at the foundation of the society. Mr. Buller, of Lincoln's Inn Fields, was the solicitor who acted for the home at that time, and it is only since he left England that I have come into that office, and I have really never had occasion to go into that matter very much; but I think it very likely that I shall find in the statutes his Lordship's signature (the Witness examined the Statutes). I do not find it, but I have a strong belief that the present Archbishop of Canterbury, when he was Bishop of London, did approve, and does still approve, of the sisterhood.

3742. It is essential to the constitution of that society that they should have the sanction of a bishop, or of some high dignitary of the Church?—I am not quite prepared to say that. The sisterhood have the power of electing their own visitor, and that visitor has the power of taking action of his own motion, as well as at the instance of any person who may feel himself to be aggrieved; and the present Archbishop of Canterbury was appointed visitor.

3743. Mr. Pemberton.] Was he appointed for life, or as bishop for the time being?—I have not got the appointment here. I did not exactly know the point to which my attention was to be directed, but I will answer that question another day, if the Committee give me the opportunity.

3744. Chairman.] Do we rightly understand that

Mr. W. Ford.

21 July 1870.

that these rules, or rather, in fact, the constitution of the society, are written?—Yes, by deed, under hand and seal.

3745. Is there any printed copy of it that you could put in?—I have no printed copy of it, but I should be very glad to send you a copy. It is written under hand and seal, signed by Mr. Upton Richards, the first chaplain, and many gentlemen whose names are well known.

3746. But this community when once established, having appointed a visitor, are subject to his authority?—Yes, undoubtedly.

3747. He visits the community, and I suppose ascertains whether it adheres to the rules that he has drawn up or sanctioned?—He has the power not only to come in when invited, but to come in upon his own motion, and one of the regulations is express upon that subject.

3748. I presume that he could dissolve the community?—No, I should not think that he could dissolve the community; he could oblige them to fulfil their obligations according to the statutes, but I think that he could not dissolve the community. I do not suppose that a visitor has any power to dissolve a community unless it breaks its regulations; nor has he that power then, but he may correct anything that is amiss.

3749. It is a strictly religious community, and subject to the authority of the Bishop of London or Archbishop of Canterbury?—Subject to statutes which the visitor must obey as well as anybody else.

3750. What liberty have they under their statutes; do they bind themselves in any way, or are they under any obligations as to their mode of life?—"The superior shall be a fully admitted sister, and shall be appointed in manner hereinafter mentioned, and shall have the government of the sisters, any other inmates of the said house, and of the household thereof." There is one rule which I think it would be material that I should read to the Committee, namely, the 12th, "Every sister shall have free and uncontrolled liberty whenever she shall think fit to leave the house and society; but it is expected that no one will leave the sisterhood without giving a month's notice, during which, if thought necessary, the matter may be referred to the visitor."

3751. Then, do they enter into any arrangement or obligation to submit to the decision of the visitor upon such matters?—"Every sister shall, in addition to probation, agree to be bound by and observe all the statutes and rules of the said society applicable to herself, and such probationers shall not in any manner interfere or prefer complaints to the chaplain or to the visitor respecting the conduct of the house, or the members thereof." And by the 14th rule, "The superior may, with the consent of the majority of the sisters and of the chaplain, make and vary such rules for the internal management and discipline of the sisters as shall be consistent with the statutes of the society, and be approved of by the visitor, and such rules shall be accessible to all members of the society."

3752. Is there any deed or contract that they sign upon entering the house?—That I cannot tell; that is a matter of internal regulation which would not come under my notice as solicitor; I believe that there is not. I believe that this rule which I have read to you, saying that they shall have free and uncontrolled liberty to leave whenever they think proper, is the genuine expression of their regulations, and the mode in which they live.

3753. But they enter into certain mutual obligations upon becoming members of the community?—I suppose that they enter into an obligation, that they will observe the rules for the time being, otherwise there could be no order in the house.

3754. How is this house maintained; does each sister bring in a dowry or a sum of money?—That I really cannot tell you; I can only tell you that all their corporate fund consists of 7,000 l. stock. I suppose that each sister does pay something, according to her means.

3755. You speak of a common fund, to your knowledge, of 7,000 l.?—There is 7,000 l. stock. I made that inquiry, because I thought that I might have that question put to me, and Miss Harriet Brownlow Byron, the Superior, writes to me on the 16th of this month, "The houses in Margaret-street and about 7,000 l. stock is all we have, and that is invested in the names of the four trustees."

3756. You were not solicitor to the house when it was first established?—No, Mr. John Edward Buller, who has left this country, was their first solicitor, and I have been solicitor to it for seven, eight, or ten years, or some such time as that; but I have really had so little to do for them that I have never had occasion to master the subject.

3757. Do you know anything of the circumstances of its foundation?—Only this, that Miss Brownlow Byron bought the houses and conveyed them to the trustees for the benefit of the institution.

3758. Is she the person in whose name this house purports to stand as the owner?—It is assigned to Mr. Walter Carew Cocks, Mr. Philip Charles Hardwicke, Mr. Benjamin Lancaster, and Mr. John Edward Buller; that is to say, it is assigned from Miss Byron to certain trustees for the benefit of this home.

3759. Is she the only person interested?—She is the only person interested, and in the statutes it is determined that if this house and home is dissolved during her lifetime the house is to return to her because it was her gift, and that if after her death it is dissolved then it is to be disposed of to such religious objects as the trustees for the time being may think proper.

3760. Mr. Pemberton.] Is that declared by the deed?—By the statutes.

3761. Do the statutes refer to that particular deed?—That deed refers to the statutes rather.

3762. Mr. Sherlock.] What is the date of the statutes?—The 18th of January 1859.

3763. They were cotemporaneous with this deed?—Yes, and those houses are conveyed to the trustees upon the trusts in connection with these statutes.

3764. Chairman.] This deed only refers to the houses, I think?—That deed refers to the houses.

3765. Does the stock, of which you have spoken, stand in the names of trustees for the use of the house?—Yes.

3766. Can you give us an account of any other property that they hold in common?—I believe that they have no other property that they hold in common.

3767. Would you know it if they had?—No, except in this way, that last week, thinking that very likely I might be asked the question to-day, I wrote rote to the superior to ask what property they . and she has given me the answer which I e read to you.

768. They have not precluded themselves by r statutes or regulations from taking property trustees?—No; they may receive property heir own names or in the names of trustees; n the sisters go away or die they or their resentatives shall not be considered to have right to a share of the property of the com- nity.

769. Though they may contribute some, they not to take any away?—It is not put so in ress words, but that is the legitimate infer- e, I think.

770. They have bound themselves so to act? es.

771. Mr. Pemberton.] But those statutes do provide that they shall pay anything at all, do y?—No, nor that they shall give anything at

772. Therefore, while agreeing that they will take anything away, it does not necessarily low from that that they should have lost any- ng?—No. The 22nd rule is this: "If the nt of funds, or any other cause, render it ex- dient to do so, the superior and sisters, or a jority of two-thirds of their number, including ers and probationers, shall have power to dis- ve the society, and, in such cases, the houses l property of the said society in Margaret- eet, Cavendish-square, shall be re-conveyed and vested in the said Harriet Brownlow ron, her executors, administrators and assigns, the dissolution shall take place in her lifetime, t if the same shall take place after her decease; n the superior and sisters for the time being all have power on such dissolution to order the e and conversion of the whole of the property d effects thereof, both real and personal, into ney, and the clear moneys produced thereby, er paying all expenses attending such sale and nversion, and all debts owing from or on ac- unt of the society, shall be disposed of for such aritable purposes in connection with the Church England, and in such manner, and, if thought , in such shares or proportions as the trustees all determine at a meeting specially called for at purpose, and which shall be held not less an three or more than six calendar months ter the sale shall have been completed.

3773. Chairman.] Is there anything in the atutes with reference to the personal estate?—he 17th rule says, "All the real estates and nattels real, houses, leasehold or copyhold estates, nd all moneys invested in the public stocks or nds, and all household furniture, books, linen, ina, and other furniture and personal effects spectively belonging to the society, shall be spectively conveyed and assigned unto and in- sted in the names of the trustees for the time eing of the society, and be held by them upon ust for the benefit thereof."

3774. The dissolution of the society could not ke place without the sanction of the visitor, uld it?—As I read it, the sisters could do it emselves. "The superior and sisters, or a ajority of two-thirds of their number," can, ithout the consent of the visitor, dissolve; it es not say, "without the consent," but that ould be implied.

3775. Do you know where this 7,000 l., of hich you have spoken, was derived from?—I do ot; but I could find that out for you, and I shall be most happy to ascertain and communicate it to you by letter or in person.

Mr. W. Ford.

3776. Is there much expense in the maintenance of this house and connected with this institution?—I never see those accounts, and I have never had occasion to be consulted. Their legal transactions are done for nothing, and I think that people are very good to them, and they supply them with money as they want it; and they send round, I have heard, for broken victuals in the morning for persons who live in their house.

3777. Do they solicit contributions?—I expect they do, but that is not within my personal knowledge; at all events, they receive them. I was instrumental in receiving for them some time ago, under Lord Henry Seymour's will, a sum of 400 l.; he left a large sum of money to be divided between the hospices of Paris and London, and under that bequest they received 400 l., and they are to receive a further sum.

3778. Was that under a peculiar construction of that word "hospices"?—Yes, it was decided that the word "hospice" did not mean a hospital in the sense in which we English use it; but that it meant a place for the sick and incurable and infirm.

3779. Are we to understand you that this institution receives the sick?—Yes.

3780. Have they arrangements for that purpose; have they wards specially for the sick?—Yes.

3781. Mr. Sherlock.] That appears to be the object of the institution?—Yes; perhaps you will allow me to read the first rule again: "The object of the said society, called the Sisters of the Poor, is the reception and maintenance of incurables, and aged and infirm persons in destitute circumstances, and orphans"; and it is within my personal knowledge that they have a ward for them, because a servant of mine, or a sister of a servant of mine, has been there and was most kindly treated.

3782. Chairman.] That seems to point to their having either an independent fortune of their own or subscriptions?—I expect that they have sub scriptions.

3783. Do you know the number of the sick that they have in their wards?—No; but I could ascertain that and let you know.

3784. Have they a school, or has the institution any connection with education?—The teaching of children is not mentioned in the rules; but I have a strong impression that they do teach children. I should not like to say that positively till I have made inquiry.

3785. Are they engaged in religious teaching and the spread of religious works; do they circulate tracts as some societies do?—I cannot tell.

3786. Do we rightly understand you that they are exclusively connected with the Church of England?—Undoubtedly.

3787. Who is this chaplain that belongs to them; is he paid by the society?—I do not think he is paid at all; he is Mr. Upton Richards, who is the vicar of All Saints', Margaret-street, Cavendish-square.

3788. What exactly are his duties in connection with this house?—He is the chaplain; I suppose he conducts their services and visits their sick, and performs the duties that a chaplain to an institution of this kind may be expected to perform.

3789. Does he perform the church service within

Mr. W. Ford.
21 July 1870.

within the house?—I suppose that it is done through him or his curates, but that I do not know of my own knowledge.

3790. You do not know whether there are any arrangements for the church service in the building?—There is a little chapel, I have heard, but I have never seen it.

3791. And is the service in it conducted according to the forms of the Church of England?—I have no doubt that it is so, because they are indissolubly tied to the Church of England by their statutes; I have no manner of doubt of it.

3792. Was this the first superior that you have referred to?—Yes.

3793. Did you mention the year when the institution was established?—In 1859.

3794. Have they any communication with other religious persuasions?—That I cannot tell, but I should think not. If you mean with the Church of Rome, undoubtedly not.

3795. You would be the person to advise them if there was any bequest or grant of land to their institution, would you not?—They could not receive a bequest of land. They could receive a grant in the names of trustees, if the donor of the land lived a year after he executed the deed.

3797. Mr. Pemberton.] It is subject to the ordinary law of Mortmain?—Yes.

3798. Chairman.] You mean that they can receive land by means of trustees?—Certainly; for they have two houses now; they are leasehold, no doubt, but they might be freehold.

3799. They can receive land by the intervention of trustees?—Certainly, if the donor or conveyer of that land lives for one year after the date of the conveyance, and if it is enrolled in Chancery under the 9th George the Second, which enables them to receive a gift of land.

3800. Mr. Pemberton.] The Act does not enable anybody to receive, I think; it only makes certain gifts void?—Yes.

3801. Chairman.] If there was land conveyed to A. B. to hold in trust for this community it would be legal?—If the person who conveyed it lived for one year after the date of the conveyance, and if the conveyance was enrolled in Chancery.

3802. Mr. Bourke.] They must comply with the Statutes of Mortmain, in short?—They must comply with the Statutes of Mortmain; they are like any other charitable institution in that respect.

3803. Chairman.] Has this institution any charter?—No, they are not a corporation; they have no charter.

3804. You are not aware of their having received any property since you have been connected with them?—Yes; there was that grant of 400 l. from Lord Henry Seymour, and there is something like 50 l. or 100 l. more which will fall to their share, which I hoped to receive before the long vacatian, but which I shall not receive probably before Christmas.

3805. But you have not heard of any investment in land lately by this community?—I am certain there has been no investment. That could not have been done without my knowledge, and I am certain that it has not taken place.

3806. Mr. Newdegate.] Has this trust to which you refer as being the operative document under which this property is held by the community been enrolled?—No, it did not require enrolment.

3807. Has it, or has it not, been enrolled?—To the best of my knowledge it has not.

3808. Mr. Pemberton.] They would not enrol it, would they?—I suppose they would not enrol it.

3809. Mr. Sherlock.] Look at this memorandum at the foot of the lease (handing a document to the Witness)?—This deed has been enrolled, but the statutes would not require enrolling.

3810. Mr. Newdegate.] Is that the lease that has been enrolled?—It is the assignment of the lease that has been enrolled.

3811. And that is the subject-matter of the trust?—That is one of the subject-matters of the trust.

3812. Mr. Bourke.] Is it enrolled under the Statute of Mortmain?—"Enrolled in Her Majesty's High Court of Chancery the 8th of February 1859, being first duly stamped according to the tenor of the Statutes made for that purpose." This was before I was solicitor; so that I really was not acquainted with the operation.

3813. Mr. Newdegate.] You find that the lease, which is the subject-matter of this trust, has been enrolled?—No, that is not quite it; the lease was granted to Miss Byron; the assignment of it to trustees for the benefit of this institution has been enrolled.

3814. This is an institution held in certain premises?—Yes.

3815. Those premises are under lease?—Yes, they are held on lease.

3816. And that lease empowering the occupier to hold is enrolled?—No, it is not.

3817. Then what is enrolled?—The assignment of that lease to the trustees of this institution is enrolled.

3818. Then the trustees are enrolled, if not the trust?—You cannot say that the trustees are enrolled; that would be a misapplication of a legal term.

3819. Do the names of these trustees appear in the Rolls Court or in the Court of Chancery?—Yes.

3820. As holding this property?—Yes.

3821. Then you have spoken of certain rules; do those rules form items in a contract among the persons inhabiting this house in community?—I can hardly admit that supposition; as I understand it, these are rules laid down for the regulation of the house and the inmates of it, and any person who comes into that house agrees to be bound by those regulations as they then subsist, or as they are varied by competent authority.

3822. But is obedience to these rules matter of contract?—Yes, I have no doubt it is so; indeed, here is the form in which that contract is entered into: "We, the undersigned, do hereby severally agree to be bound by and observe all and every the statutes and rules of the Society of the Sisters of the Poor established by the foregoing deed, so far as the same are applicable to us respectively, God being our helper," and that is signed by every sister as she joins.

3823. That is almost in the nature of a vow, is it not?—I do not call that a vow.

3824. Mr.

3824. Mr. Pemberton.] There is no form of h in the statutes, is there?—No.
3825. Mr. Newdegate.] The effect of it is, that e are certain rules binding upon these persons contract, and that contract is attested by them th the words usually used to impress upon a or the idea that he is taking an oath?—If you me my opinion, I do not agree in that view it.
3826. I ask you what you understand by the ds that you have read?—I understand that persons who join the institution agree to be und by the rules of the deed of settlement, t as much as the shareholders in a joint stock npany agree to be bound by the terms of their d of settlement; it is done in rather a more mal way; it is a religious society and they use pressions which are not used in a deed of tlement in the City of London, but the effect it is precisely the same in my estimation, aking as a lawyer.
3827. Then in the first place the legal power the rules is the power of an engagement by ntract?—Yes.
3828. And obedience to or compliance with at contract seems to be enforced in that docu-nt by the use of religious expressions, equivant to the terms in which an oath is usually ken; is not that the substance of what you ve read to the Committee?—I do not attach at opinion to it myself; I do not know whether is important that I should have an opinion on it, but I certainly do not agree in that ew.
3829. But whatever may be your opinion, ose words which you have read are to be found the document before you?—Yes, certainly.
3830. Then you have said that there is 7,000*l.*
stock which you described as common stock?
I do not think that I used that expression, but is stock vested in the names of the trustees, d held upon trust for the purposes of these tutes.
3831. That is to say for the purposes of the mmunity?—Yes, for the sustentation of them, d to be applied in any way in which the sisters
y think proper to ordain.
3832. Consistently with the statutes?—Yes, course; "The trustees shall pay the rents, vidends and other animal produce, and all other nies received from time to time by them, ether capital or annual income, into the hands the bankers for the time being of the society the account and credit of the said society, and ch payment shall be a sufficient discharge to e trustees for the monies so paid to them; and e superior shall have power to draw out monies om the bankers for the use of the society as ay be required."
3833. Is that an extract from the statutes or om the rules?—From the statutes which are e rules.
3834. Then, when you speak of the rules, you ean the statutes?—I do.
3835. Now, with reference to these statutes,
e they obligatory upon the visitor?—Yes.
3836. Then the visitor has no power outside
e statutes?—None whatever.
3837. Mr. Bourke.] As visitor you mean?—
s visitor.
3838. Mr. Newdegate.] Have you afforded any roof to the Committee that the Archbishop of anterbury has approved of these statutes?—
o, I have not afforded any proof of that. I do not find it stated in the document; but I was asked what my belief was, and I say that I believe that the Archbishop of Canterbury did, when he was Bishop of London, approve them in 1859; but I will ascertain that point specifically if you desire it by the next time that I come here, if the Committee wish me to give evidence again.

3839. If there exists documentary evidence, or any evidence that shows the distinct approval of the present Archbishop of Canterbury of these statutes, you will furnish it to this Committee?—Certainly I will.

3840. Then you say that this institution is connected exclusively with the Church of England?—Yes.

3841. What are the terms in the statutes which present that exclusive connection?—"In the name of the Holy and Undivided Trinity"; the statutes begin, "The following statutes have been agreed on and adopted for the due order and government of the house of the Sisters of the Poor, which has been established for the purposes hereinafter set forth; and those statutes have been adopted with the desire and intent that through the blessing of God the principles on which the said house has been founded may be always preserved unchanged and inviolate, and that it may be conducted and carried on in accordance with the true Christian faith, as it is set forth in the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England, to the glory of Almighty God and the eternal salvation of souls, for whom Christ died; therefore, these presents witness, and it is hereby agreed and declared as follows, that is to say"; then the statutes follow in order.

3842. Then this peculiar discipline which is enforced by contract upon the inmates of this institution is by that deed annexed, as it might be, to the discipline of the Church of England?—Undoubtedly; it is indissolubly connected with the Church of England, tied to the Church of England. That is the cardinal point which regulates the whole.

3843. Quoad the power of those who originated this community and this trust?—Those who originated this community and trust desired to tie it indissolubly to the Church of England. I think that no lawyer can doubt the effect of these statutes after what I have just read.

3844. Who did you say was the chaplain?—Mr. Upton Richards, the vicar of All Saints', Margaret-street.

3845. There is a chapel in the building?—I believe there is; I have never been into it, but I have heard that there is.

3846. Is there any regulation in the statutes for the observance of the services in that chapel according to the forms of the Church of England?—No, I think that the chapel did not exist then; the chapel has been added, I have heard, since then.

3847. There is no such provision in the statutes?—There is no provision in the statutes for the maintenance of service in the chapel of the institution.

the chaplain. The third rule is this: "The superior shall be a full admitted sister and shall be appointed in manner hereafter mentioned, and shall have the government of the sisters and other inmates of the house and of the household thereof. The first chaplain of the house shall be the Reverend William Upton Richards, the Incumbent of the said district of All Saints; and all future chaplains of the said house shall be elected by the said superior and sisters, and shall be approved and confirmed by the visitor."

3849. Then that refers to the superior?—No, to the chaplain; "the first chaplain of the house shall be the Reverend William Upton Richards, and all future chaplains of the house shall be elected by the said superior and sisters, and shall be approved and confirmed by the visitor."

3850. Is that first chaplain a clergyman of the Church of England?—Yes, he is a clergyman of the Church of England now; the Rev. William Upton Richards is a well-known clergyman in London.

3851. Mr. Sherlock.] Is he not there described as the Incumbent of St. Margaret's?—Yes, "the Incumbent of the said district of All Saints"; and he has been there for many years.

3852. Mr. Newdegate.] The appointment of the chaplain depends upon selection by the superior?—And upon election by the superior and sisters, and subject to the confirmation of the visitor.

3853. Then the superior you stated is to be "a fully admitted sister"?—Yes.

3854. Is there any difference in the grades?—There are two kinds; there are probationers, and there are fully admitted sisters.

3855. Mr. Bourke.] That is all in the rules, I suppose?—That is all in the rules. "The sisters consist of two classes; first, confirmed sisters after probation; and secondly, sisters probationers. The time and nature of probation shall be settled in the rules hereinafter mentioned; but the superior and sisters, with the advice of the chaplain, shall be at liberty to shorten the period of probation at their discretion in any particular case."

3856. Are those rules contained in a subsequent part of the document which you hold in your hand?—Yes; the 11th rule says: "No person shall be admitted into the house as sister probationer unless she be a member of the Church of England, and in full communion with the same; and every such admission shall be made in such manner and form as shall be determined and set forth in the said rules."

3857. Perhaps you will put those rules in?—I will send a copy of them as soon as it can be made.

3858. Mr. Pemberton.] I think you said that there was no secrecy or wish for concealment, with regard to this institution?—Certainly, there is none.

3859. It would be impossible to conceal it, would it not?—I will not say that it would be impossible to conceal it, but I am certain that it is not to their interest, and that it is not their wish to conceal it. It is my constant advice to give the fullest information to everybody.

3860. I mean that the assignment of the lease to the four trustees contains actually a declaration of the trust on which the property is to be held by way of reference?—Yes, but it only refers to the statutes, and the statutes are not necessarily a private document which would no be open to the public.

3861. But the trustees must hold it in trus according to those rules and regulations whic you have put in?—Yes.

3862. Those rules and regulations declaring it t be strictly for the benefit of persons in communio with the Church of England, it would be impossi ble to apply the property of this institution t any other purpose?—Wholly impossible.

3863. You know as a lawyer, that when trust are declared as clearly as that, any person enti tled to the benefit of the trust, could enforce th specific performance of the trust in the Court o Chancery?—Yes; or any person could set i motion the Attorney General as the relator t make anybody do his duty in the matter, or se in motion the Charity Commissioners.

3864. I suppose that this is such an institutio as would come under the jurisdiction of th Charity Commissioners?—I do not quite kno whether the Charity Commissioners can meddl with charities of so late a date as 1859, but I d not say that they cannot, because I have neve applied my attention to that.

3865. There cannot, in your opinion, be an abuse of this charity, by its being diverted fo the benefit of any other religion?—If any of th parties do not do their duty there are the sam means of requiring them to do their duty as exis for all other trusts.

3866. All the trusts are open and clear, an can be ascertained by referring to particula documents?—Yes, or can be got at; for th statutes are not enrolled themselves, but you ca get at them by proper proceedings.

3867. My friend, the Member for North War wickshire, asked you whether obedience to thes rules was not a matter of contract?—Yes.

3868. I do not know whether you meant t attach any particular importance to the wor "contract"?—I say that it is the same contrac as exists between the shareholders and the di rectors of a public company for carrying on bank or insurance office, or any other publi undertaking.

3869. Is it so strong as that; does not a share holder when he executes a deed of settlemen actually covenant that he will be bound by th rules?—I suppose he does, but I suppose that i equity the members of this institution also woul be bound by these regulations.

3870. My friend, the Member for North War wickshire, attached importance to the word "con tract;" is it anything more than this, "I agre to be bound by the rules of the club into whic I enter"?—That is it.

3871. Is it anything more; is there any cove nant?—There is no covenant.

3872. Chairman.] I think one of the terms o the agreement is, that no sister shall withdra any property which she may have given to th community?—"No sister, whether dismissed o not, whether remaining or not, or her heirs executors, or administrators, shall have or b entitled, either in her lifetime or after her decease to, or shall have power to claim, either at law o in equity, any estate, right, title, interest, pro perty, or share whatsoever in or to the real estat or chattels real, houses, leasehold or copyhol estates, stocks, funds, and monies, or in or to th household furniture, books, linen, china, and othe chattels and personal effects belonging to or hel in trust for or used for the purposes of the sai society iety, or any of them, or any part or parts reof, anything herein contained to the con- ry thereof in anywise notwithstanding." I nk that is binding. It is like the rules of a ıb; I take it that no gentleman, when he goes ay from a club, can claim, nor can his executors im, any part of the property of the club. I nk that a club is a much better illustration of connection which exists here in this case than leed of settlement such as I referred to just w.

3873. Mr. Pemberton.] Because in the one e there is a covenant, and here there is only an plied agreement?—Yes, it stands exactly in same relation to this institution that the rules a club do to a club.

3874. There is nothing in those rules which kes it compulsory on any of the sisters to con- bute anything?—Nothing.

3875. So that if they do contribute anything, y contribute with a knowledge of that rule to ich you have referred, and with the full recol- tion that when they leave the society they l not be able to take it away?—Yes.

3876. Chairman.] There is a written agree- nt, and it is binding on them?—Yes; no one en she goes away can say, "that chair or table ongs to me, that has been bought partly by money."

3877. Mr. Pemberton.] It would be binding in s way, that money once given would form rt of the common fund, and that agreement uld prevent a person from claiming part of t common fund?—Yes.

3878. My friend, the Member for North arwickshire referred to the use of a religious pression equivalent to the words of an oath; I not think the words you quoted can be so garded?—I did not regard it as an oath myself; do not know whether it is becoming for me to press my opinion what it really does mean; t the words are these, "We the undersigned hereby severally agree to be bound by, and serve all, and every, the statutes and rules of e Society of the Sisters of the Poor, established the foregoing deed, so far as the same are plicable to us respectively, God being our lper." I dare say that a great many persons tender conscience might feel that in doing that ey were entering into a solemn obligation, and at if they failed in it, they would feel it some rt of a burden on their conscience, but they ill do it as nearly as they can, they mean, and is not to be a pressure on their conscience if ey happen to fail through lack of attention, or rough infirmity of purpose.

3879. I think you said that in case the society ould be dissolved after the death of the found- ss, the property was all to be realized, and the oney was to be applied in such way as the ustees should direct?—Yes, "in connection ith the Church of England," I think the words e.

3880. Do you remember whether there is any ower of appointing new trustess?—Yes; and have exercised it myself.

3881. What is the power of appointing new ustees?—The 19th rule says, "Whenever any ustee or trustees shall die, or desire to be dis- harged, or shall refuse or become incapable to ct, the superior and sisters shall appoint a suc- essor or successors." It also goes on, "But his provision shall not supersede the power of ppointing new trustees conveyed in such original conveyance or assignment," the object being to keep the title clear so that it may not be necessary for a purchaser from the trustees to ascertain whether the sisters had properly appointed new trustees.

3882. But the result would be this, would it not, that the persons ultimately to distribute the funds would be the persons appointed by the community itself?—Yes.

3883. Mr. J. G. Talbot.] With regard to the property, though the rules distinctly provide that the members shall not be able to keep any part of the common property, there is nothing in the rules which prevents any woman from continuing to hold her own personal property, is there?—Nothing whatever.

3884. So that this community entirely differs from any community where every person on entering gives up all private property?—Yes, there is no such relinquishment of private property in this case, and I know of my own knowledge that they do retain their property, because I have been asked to make wills and deeds of gift for the sisters.

3885. Is it not just the same as with any member of a college at one of the universities, who could not claim any part of the property of that college which he had himself contributed, but at the same time is not debarred from claiming any part of his private property which he may have brought with him to the college?—Certainly; they do not give up their property by joining the institution, they retain their money in the funds or anywhere else where they may have it, and of course they go away with that; but any money that they have paid in to the treasurer or to the trustees is held for the common purposes of the institution, and it would lead to the most serious inconveniences if that sum of money had to be followed, and you had to try and distinguish it from other sums of money given by other people.

3886. Chairman.] But there is no arrangements amongst them to give up the property that they receive afterwards?—Not at all.

3887. One of the sisters might receive a large sum, and she would not be bound to distribute it?—Not in the least.

3888. They take no vow to live in poverty, and there is nothing to preclude their taking property?—Not in the least.

3889. Mr. J. G. Talbot.] With regard to the chaplains, the honourable Member for North Warwickshire put to you, that the chaplain was supposed to be a clergyman of the Church of England. According to the rules it is impossible for him to be anything but a clergyman of the Church of England, is it not?—Mr. Upton Richards, who was appointed, was undoubtedly a clergyman of the Church of England then, and is now, and the chaplain is, I think it is mentioned, to be a member of the Church of England.

3890. I ask you as a lawyer whether it would not be impossible for an institution, connected inseparably, as you say this is with the Church of England, to have a person called a chaplain who is not in holy orders in that church?—Of course.

3891. It would be contrary to common sense?—Quite contrary to the spirit of the whole of the statutes.

3892. If not in words impossible, it is practically impossible?—It is practically impossible, if not so in words.

Mr. W. Ford.

21 July 1870.

3893. Sir J. Ogilvy.] You say that his appointment is subject to confirmation by the visitor?—There must be a visitor, and the present visitor is the Archbishop of Canterbury, that is to say, he was, when he was Bishop of London, appointed visitor; whether he has ceased to become visitor by ceasing to be Bishop of London, I should not like to say.

3894. Chairman.] May they select their own visitor?—Yes.

3895. But the chaplain must be called a member of the Church of England?—Certainly.

3896. Mr. Bourke.] Do not answer the question which I am about to ask you if you have any objection to do so; this 7,000 l. that you have spoken of belonged to the institution before you were connected with it, I suppose?—Yes, I believe so; I cannot exactly say; that has not come under my knowledge since I have been there.

3897. Do you know who gave it?—No; but I can find it out, and will tell you with the greatest pleasure; I have not the least objection; there is no mystery at all about it.

3898. With regard to what is called common property, that is to say, property vested in trustees, unless that property is absolutely and directly vested in trustees by the different ladies, they lose no control over any other property whatsoever?—They do not lose any control over any property but what they absolutely pay to the treasurer for that purpose.

3899. With regard to these rules, do you know whether they were made upon the model of any others?—I do not know; Mr. Buller framed them, I did not.

3900. Do you know whether any other institution has taken them as a model?—That I cannot say; I think they bear some resemblance, but not a close resemblance to those of Clewer, which I did frame.

3901. Have you ever thought of communicating with the Charity Commissioners with regard to this property?—No; I have never had my attention directed to that.

3902. Or they with you?—No; the idea has never been suggested to my mind till I came into this room.

3903. Mr. G. Gregory.] As I understand those rules, every lady enters into a contract that she will not claim as against the common fund?—Not a contract in the technical sense of the word; but there is an agreement that she will not carry away any part of it.

3904. You are acquainted with the doctrine of equity as regards contracts being vitiated by fraud, surprise, and undue influence; all those doctrines would operate upon that contract, I presume?—Yes, certainly; if any of those injurious impressions were made upon the minds of the persons who signed.

3905. They must do it with their eyes open, freely and deliberately?—Certainly; there is nothing to take it out of the ordinary rules which bind all societies, and which regulate the interference of the Court of Chancery.

3906. I think you said that you have never turned your attention to the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners?—No, I have not, with regard to this institution; I have with regard to others.

3907. You will answer this question or not, just as you please; supposing the Charity Commissioners should wish to exercise their jurisdiction with respect to this institution, should you feel individually any objection to their doing so?—I think any lawyer would say that he would sooner not be meddled with by the Charity Commissioners; but I should not object to it on any grounds of secresy, if you meant that. There is nothing to conceal.

3908. Chairman.] But did we rightly understand you, that any property left for this institution would be regarded as a charity?—Undoubtedly; it could only be personal property, and pure personal property, as lawyers call it.

3909. I mean, would you call any property left for this institution a charity?—Yes.

3910. And, therefore, it would come under the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners?—I do not know back to what date they have powers; but it stands in the same position as any other institution; as the hospital across the river, for example.

3911. At present there has been no permanent endowment of it?—Nothing in the nature of a permanent endowment beyond the bequest of the house.

3912. Mr. G. Gregory.] Is this house that you have spoken of in Middlesex?—Yes; 82, Margaret-street, Cavendish-square.

3913. And the lease is registered in Middlesex?—Yes, and the assignment of it is enrolled in the Court of Chancery.

3914. And may be seen by anybody?—Yes.

3915. Chairman.] You will send us the rules?—I will send a copy of the statutes immediately.

3916. Can you state whether these rules could be varied without the sanction of the visitor?—The 14th rule says: "The superior may, with the consent of the majority of the sisters and the chaplain, make and vary such rules for the internal management and discipline of the sisters as shall be consistent with the statutes of the society, and be approved by the visitor." The superior and the majority of the sisters and the chaplain may make any rules consistent with the statutes; but they must be approved by the visitor, "and all such rules shall be accessible to all members of the society."

3917. I suppose that there is no rule that provides for the bishop or visitor being of the Established Church; it is presumed that he always will be?—No, there is no such rule; the sisters may choose their own visitor. But he could not be anything but a member of the English Church, because the first rule says that it shall be conducted and carried on in "accordance with the true Christian faith as it is set forth in the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England." It is indissolubly tied to it.

3918. So that they could not elect the Archbishop of Westminster to be visitor?—No.

3919. I suppose you are not now acting for any other home?—I am acting, I think I may say, for St. Peter's Home, at Kilburn, which Mr. Benjamin Lancaster has lately founded. I assisted him in that to some extent, and I acted for 20 years to the Clewer House of Mercy, and resigned that position last year.

3920. Is there anything peculiar connected with those institutions that distinguishes them from the one that you have been speaking about to-day?—No; they are all much on the same footing; they are tied to the Church of England, the bishop is the visitor, and the inmates have all liberty iberty to go away whenever they think pro-er.

3921. Mr. Pemberton.] And their property is eld by trustees for them?—Yes; of whom, in the ase of Clewer, Mr. Gladstone is one, Sir John oleridge another, and the Bishop of Winchester third.

3922. Chairman.] They are all religious so-ieties holding property in common?—Yes.

3923. Mr. Pemberton.] They have some pro-erty in common, you mean?—Yes; and Clewer as got freehold property on which their House f Mercy is built; it is freehold, not leasehold; ut they have no land in the ordinary sense of he term, no land from which they derive income.

3924. Chairman.] They may have no land at resent, but there is nothing to preclude their having it?—They can only receive it in the way in which any other charitable institution can receive it, through the intervention of trustees, and it must be duly enrolled, and all the other formalities must be observed.

3925. Mr. Bourke.] There is a distinction between holding common property and holding property in common, is there not?—They do not hold property in common.

3926. When people are said to hold property in common, it means that they hold all their property in common; that is not the case here?—No; they do not hold all their property in common in any of these institutions; they have their own property, and they make their wills and dispose of that property, like any other individuals.

Mr. Arthur Hobhouse, Q.C., called in; and Examined.

3927. Chairman.] You are one of the Charity Commissioners still?—Yes, I am. I ought to ay that I am rather a sham commissioner. I im not acting much on the Commission. I act n the Endowed Schools Commission, though I emain on the Charity Commission.

3928. Were you a commissioner when it was irst established?—No, I was appointed in 1866; nd I was actively working on the Commission bout three years and a half.

3929. But you had an opportunity of knowing, while you were so acting, what were the charities hat were brought particularly under the jurisliction or within the jurisdiction of the Commission; and I would wish to ask you whether ou learnt during that time the reasons why no Roman Catholic charities were enrolled or were ubjected to your jurisdiction?—I can hardly say hat I learnt the reasons, because we had very ittle intercourse with Roman Catholic charities. The fact was as I state; I suppose the reason partly was that the Roman Catholic charities were not subject to the Charitable Trusts Act until a considerably later period than other charities. I think it was in 1860.

3930. In 1860 what is called the Roman Catholic Charities Act passed?—Yes.

3931. Since the time when you were appointed, you have not observed that you have had much to do with Roman Catholic charities?—No, not a great deal; not so much as with the Protestant Dissenters or Church of England charities.

3932. But looking to the provisions of the Act affecting your jurisdiction, and to the purpose of legislation in that respect, Roman Catholic charities were intended to be placed on the footing of all others, were they not?—Clearly so.

3933. Can you tell us then what difficulties Roman Catholics had in bringing their charities under your notice, and why it is that, as you may say, they have hardly availed themselves of the Act after the first year of its passing?—I have always believed that the difficulties which have affected Roman Catholic charities have been that some of the trusts, whether expressed or implied, on which the property is held, are obnoxious to rules of law, and as to others it is doubted whether they are or are not obnoxious to rules of law; and, in some cases the Roman Catholics have feared to expose themselves to deprivation of their property, and in other cases to litigation, which they have a very natural desire to avoid. That was the reason why they were excepted, I believe, from the earlier Charitable Trusts Act for six or seven years; and I suppose that that same reason has operated to prevent them from coming very forward before the public tribunals.

3934. You consider that that state of the law which made them obnoxious to it before 1860 continues still?—It certainly continues to some extent.

3935. I think the Commission was constituted in 1853 or 1854?—In 1853.

3936. Then in 1860 this Roman Catholic Charities Act was passed?—Yes.

3937. Did not that remove their difficulties, or extend some relief to them which did not exist before?—No doubt it did; but we must always remember that a habit once formed takes a great many years to get rid of, and people who have had their fingers burnt fear the fire.

3938. But, practically, what is the case; is there any difficulty, from any state of the law, that Roman Catholics ought to feel now in disclosing their trusts?—I take it that that depends entirely upon the nature of the trusts. I ought to say that I am speaking in a very uninstructed manner upon the question as to the legality or illegality of particular Roman Catholic trusts, because it is a point that I have never studied. I never happened to have any question of the kind in my practice as a barrister, and I have never had it brought before me judicially as a Charity Commissioner; therefore I am only speaking of what I know at secondhand, and from the casual occurrence of questions of that kind. But I believe that in the case of monasteries, where vows are imposed upon those who enter them, the best lawyers think that trusts of property for such institutions would be illegal. I believe also that in the case of convents (either for men or for women) generally, independently of the question of vows, there is some doubt about it; but I am not at all prepared to say myself how far those doubts or those opinions are ill or well grounded.

3939. Did the Commission consider that any property left for the benefit of a monastery or convent would come under the description of a charity?—I only remember one case of the kind coming before myself, or, indeed, before the Board, while I was a member of it. That was a case either at Hastings or St. Leonards, where, if I recollect rightly, there was an institution of a conventual character with a school attached to it, and I think it had two distinct sets of trusts; one was for education and the other was for the support of that religious body to whom the education was committed. All I can say is, that we did not entertain any doubt that that was a charity in toto. I remember myself making an order for either the sale or mortgage of some of the property. The title was accepted by a stranger, and therefore I suppose that nobody else entertained any doubt upon it. The validity of the title, you see, would depend upon the validity of our order.

Mr. A. Hobhouse.

3940. You do not state that that was either a monastery or a convent, but that it was a society of a conventual character?—Yes.

3941. That would, I presume, have made the deed void, so far as it went; but inasmuch as there was some object of promoting education, so far it was good, as I understand you?—No; what I said was this: that I believe that doubts had been entertained about the validity of convents in general. Of the validity of those doubts I say nothing. All I know is, that in the only case that came before us, where the trusts were, if I recollect rightly, for the support of a religious body (I think it was of ladies exclusively) and for the support of a school in connection with that body, we treated the whole as being a valid legal trust for charitable purposes, and that treatment of ours has been accepted by somebody or other who bought the property under our order.

3942. That recognises that societies of a conventual character are legal?—In that particular case the trusts were exceedingly short, I recollect. I had to look into them, because they wanted some adjustment of their property, and some question arose between the two classes of trusts.

3943. I presume that that decision would guide the Commission in cases that were similar?—Yes. I can hardly call it a decision, however, because the question was not disputed by anybody. It did not occur to us to suppose that there was any illegality in a number of ladies collected together, holding property together, receiving an endowment, and keeping a school.

3944. Then practically the Commission view convents or societies of a conventual character as legitimate objects of charity, and you would administer trusts in their case much in the same way as in the case of a Protestant community?—Yes; unless we were aware of any statute which appeared to make a particular society illegal, we should ask no question; we should treat the matter as subject to the jurisdiction of the Charitable Trusts Act.

3945. But do you take notice of Statutes that you may assume to make societies or communities illegal; do you look at that point?—If we knew of such a Statute, we should take notice directly of the illegality; but we do not carry the Statute Book in our heads, of course.

3946. But inasmuch as these cases most constantly arise before the Commission, they have come to some decision on the point, I suppose?—This is the only case that I know of, the only case that, as far as I know, occurred while I was at the board; and since Mr. Pemberton spoke to me about coming here yesterday, I saw the chief commissioner, Mr. Erle, and asked him if he could recollect any case, and he could not.

3947. But supposing there to be a doubt about conventual institutions, I suppose ther is no doubt about monastic institutions, an that they are made illegal by Statute, and tha any bequest for the purpose of maintaining ther would be illegal?—Of course the moment w came to the knowledge that the society itself wa subject to any law which made it illegal, w should say, "Any gift for the purpose of mai taining that society is void, and we can take n notice of it."

3948. Have you been led to consider th policy of the law as it affects these different in stitutions; is there any wisdom or advantage i making that distinction between societies of conventual character and what are called mona tic institutions?—I have not been led to conside that, and therefore I do not know on what di tinctions of law any distinction between th various societies may turn. Of course I can un derstand that there may be a very broad distinc tion, in point of policy and in point of law between societies which assume to impose bindin vows upon the consciences of their members, an those which do not; I could understand such distinction as that, but I have not been led t consider that as a lawyer at all.

3949. But you have apparently had to adminis ter a trust left to a society where there was thi kind of obligation that you refer to, of solem vows?—I was not aware of any vows in tha case which I spoke of; there was nothing abou it in the trust deed.

3950. Then it was not, perhaps, a convent?—I may not have been so; but I can only say that i was a collection of ladies who lived in what wa popularly called a convent there.

3951. Then the vows were not brought unde your attention?—No, certainly not.

3952. May we collect from you, that as far a there is any distinction between monastic institu tions and convents, it is rather of a fanciful cha racter, seeing that they are both bound by thes vows that you think are impolitic?—I shoul conceive that there is a broad distinction be tween a society that was at variance with th general policy of the country and one that wa not; but that is really speaking rather as a citize of the world than as a lawyer.

3953. But can you state to the Committe any mischief that you have observed to aris from the state of the law, seeing that yo cannot deal with trusts that are left for Catholi or monastic institutions?—It seems to me tha the law wants a most careful revision. Ther is no doubt that Roman Catholics have bee at periods since the Reformation subjecte to very great and grievous disabilities. Thos have been removed to a great extent piecemea and in such a way that it requires a very accu rate and lengthened study of the subject by skilled person to tell how far they exist and hov far they do not exist. That that state of th law can be satisfactory to anybody, I cannot con ceive; and I believe that it is that state of th law which has led, I will not say to the desire o the part of the Roman Catholics to conceal thei trusts (for I do not know that there is any suc thing), but to the fact that the Charity Commis sioners have not had that number of application before them, and that amount of dealing wit them which, from the number of their endow ments, it would be natural to expect.

3954. Do you know of any evil or inconveni ence that arises from your not having had t conside consider these different Roman Catholic charities?—No, I do not.

3955. Have you heard of any misappropriation of trusts, or of any departure from the intention of the donor or testator?—No complaint has ever reached our office on that score.

3956. Do you consider that the Commission has been the means of preventing misapplication of trusts in other cases of endowment?—I have no doubt that they have been the means very often; of course one never can tell of that which has not happened, whether it would have happened the other way; but I have no doubt of it, on account of the enormous number of complaints, increasing year by year, which are sent up on very trifling occasions, indeed most of them without foundation, but showing that people all over the country have their eyes open to the fact that there sits in London this tribunal which is ready to receive complaints.

3957. Before the existence of the Charity Commissioners, persons had to resort to a very tedious and expensive process in the Court of Chancery, in order to secure the right administration of a trust?—Yes.

3958. I believe the Charity Commission acts as regards these charities, or in cases of difference amongst trustees, gratuitously?—Yes.

3959. So that the parties are put to no expense in bringing any question before the Commission?—They have no expense in the way of court fees, or anything of that kind; of course, if they employ counsel or an attorney, they must pay them.

3960. And if you have not a concurrent jurisdiction, you have a sort of delegated jurisdiction from the Court of Chancery, have you not?—No, it is not delegated, it comes direct from the Legislature. The office is a very peculiar one, and it is not easy to describe it in a few words, but describing it as shortly as I can, I would call it in one of its aspects a subordinate branch of the Court of Chancery with precisely the same jurisdiction as the Court of Chancery, but in addition to that, holding the key of the door of the court as it were, so that no one can approach the Court of Chancery, excepting through the Charity Commission, unless it is the Attorney General.

3961. Is there an appeal from the Charity Commission to the Court of Chancery?—Yes, a direct appeal; that is the judicial side of the Commission. There is another side which is purely official or administrative; that was the earlier aspect of it, and in that respect the Commissioners make inquiries whenever they receive complaints, or otherwise find reason to make inquiries into the working and position of any charity; they receive applications from trustees who are in difficulties, or who have quarrelled, and give them advice which is authoritative in its character, and completely indemnifies everybody who acts under it; and they also have the power of enabling trustees to deal with their property in a way which they could not do otherwise by way of lease, sale, exchange, and a number of other arrangements.

3962. In fact you afford relief whenever it is required, and it is open to everybody to bring their case before the Commission?—It is open to everybody to bring a case before the Commission, we cannot of ourselves afford relief except to a limited extent.

3963. I do not quite understand why; do you not originate inquiries yourself?—Yes, inquiries; but there are several limits to the jurisdiction of the Commission. In the first place, if the charity is above 50 l. a year in value, the trustees themselves must apply for an order. If the charity is of less than 50 l. value, then somebody else, either the inhabitants of the place or persons specified in the Acts, must apply. In the third place, we cannot make a summary order of any kind for payment or restitution of property; all we can do in the way of relief is to remove the trustees or make a scheme. If there is property to be restored then we can only certify the case to the Attorney General, who, in that case, brings it before the Court of Chancery, and the Court of Chancery does justice.

3964. I presume that there is no objection in regard to those who can benefit by the trust to having it brought within your jurisdiction?—I think there has been a very general acquiescence in the jurisdiction of the Charity Commission, and I think that that has grown year by year as people have found the benefit of having the much cheaper and speedier action that they get there.

3965. In fact you would say, from what you have observed of the working of the Charity Commission, that it was a decided disadvantage to any section of the community to be precluded from having the benefit of its authority?—I think so.

3966. You have no other ground for supposing that the Roman Catholics might object to submit their charities to your notice, except that by the state of the law they are interested in not disclosing, or are induced not to disclose, their trusts?—That ground, and the other which I mentioned of long habit, that they have been so accustomed to manage their affairs amongst themselves, perhaps from the much stronger ecclesiastical organisation that they have, and the much stronger bearing that they have on the consciences of the trustees. They have had that habit, and that habit goes on.

3967. You are not prepared to state in what way they do manage their charities?—No, I do not know the inside of it at all.

3968. You have no suggestion to make to the Committee for the amendment of the law, from anything which you have observed with respect to the Roman Catholic charities?—Not from anything which I have observed.

3969. Mr. Newdegate.] You are acquainted with the terms of the Roman Catholic Charities Act of 1860?—Yes, I have brought the Act here for reference.

Mr. A. Hobhouse. 21 July 1870.

position for any charity relating to or connected with the Roman Catholic religion, shall have been applied upon any charitable trusts relating to or connected with the same religion during any continuous period of 20 years; but the original trusts of such property shall not be ascertained by means of any written document, the consistent usage of the last preceding 20 years or of the last period of 20 years, during which any consistent usage in the application of such property shall have prevailed, shall be deemed to afford conclusive evidence of the trusts on which the same property shall have been settled."

3971. Are you aware of the operation of that?—The operation of that has never come under my observation. I am not aware that it has ever come into any court of justice; but the operation would be this, that whereas in all other charities usage is taken as evidence of the trusts in case there is no evidence by written documents, and there is no positive statute saying that 20 years' usage shall be absolutely conclusive; in the case of the Roman Catholic charities this Act applies precisely the same principle, but says that 20 years shall be conclusive.

3972. That is an absolute advantage to the present owners of Roman Catholic charity property?—That is very questionable; it might be an advantage; it is sometimes an advantage to have an arbitrary rule, and sometimes not. If it is an advantage it had better be extended to other charities; I should rather do without it myself.

3973. At all events it is a peculiarity strongly tending to retain in the present hands as trustees any charity property subject to that provision?—It would have this effect, that if you showed that there was some usage prior to the term of 20 years, a court of justice could not look at that. In the case of another charity, there might be a litigation on the subject, which might turn out one way and might turn out the other; generally 20 years' usage would carry the court with it. The same principle was applied to the Dissenters' chapels. If you remember the Dissenters' Chapels Bill went on the same principle; there was a good deal of litigation about them, and Parliament thought fit to interfere, and say 20 years shall be sufficient to fix the nature of the Trusts.

3974. That is a peculiarity, securing the possession in existing trustees, which is applicable to the property of no denomination but the Roman Catholics?—No, it does not secure the existing trustees, it fixes the trusts according to 20 years' consistent usage, it is nothing to do with the position of the trustees.

3975. I did not explain myself clearly. My question related rather to the uses than to the trustees; this provision secures the uses, does it not, in a manner different from the security afforded to any other denomination?—Excepting it may be the Dissenters' Chapels Bill, I do not remember this absolute rule being introduced, but it is in the main the rule which governs the Court of Chancery and the courts of law.

3976. It may be the rule in general, but there is no other statute in which there is so distinct a restraint against interruption of possession and use?—I do not call any to mind at present, except the one I mentioned; but this observation should be confined to property, subject to public or perpetual uses. As regards private property, Lord Tenterden's Prescription Act, and indeed the Statute of Limitation, proceeds on the same principle.

3977. Notwithstanding this peculiarity, you have not found the Roman Catholic body avail themselves of the services of your Commission as the trustees and persons interested in other denominations have done?—Not to the same extent. I may tell you that there is no class of charitable foundations that has come so much and so freely under our jurisdiction as the Protestant dissenting chapels, and this by their own free will; for they have been exempted until their trustees should petition to be admitted to the benefit of the Acts. A great number was admitted every year, each by a separate proceeding. Last year an Act was passed, at the instance of the greater Dissenting bodies, to remove the exemptions they had insisted on having in the Act of 1853; they have given us a great deal of work; I have no doubt you know that very well.

3978. But you are aware that an objection to being subjected at all to your interference, if I may use the expression, or to your supervision, was entertained very strongly by the representatives of the Roman Catholics in the House of Commons previous to the passing of this statute?—No doubt it was; they got the exemption.

3979. And at the time you had reason to hope that that objection had abated, because there were a certain number of charitable properties enrolled during the years 1861 and 1862, I think?—I believe so.

3980. Were you a Charity Commissioner at that time?—No, I was not, not till 1866, so that my attention was not called to that fact.

3981. And when you became a Charity Commissioner the applications for asssistance were very few?—Very few.

3982. When you spoke of a doubt as to the legality of convents of women, did you refer, or intend to refer, to any doubt as to the purpose of the charity being superstitious, in the sense of depending upon prayers for the dead?—No. My impression is, that it is the imposition of vows which is the difficulty; but, as I tell you, I have not studied the matter; I have never had occasion to look at it as a lawyer, and I do not know it accurately.

3983. You are aware, perhaps, that there is a distinct prohibition and restraint, under the Roman Catholic Relief Act of 1829, against vows taken by men, but that there is no restraint or prohibition against vows taken by women?—That is exactly the point which I did not know; that enlightens me at once, and shows you how little I have examined the subject. I am quite as willing to show you my ignorance as my knowledge.

3984. You spoke of a convent at Hastings or St. Leonards in the case of the property of which you have interfered?—Yes.

3985. I think I understood you that there were two classes of property, one which was for the maintenance of the inmates of the convent, and the other which was for the maintenance of a school?—Speaking from memory, it was so.

3986. It was with respect to the second class only that your assistance was required?—No, with respect to both.

3987. You did not feel any scruple in dealing with this property of the first description, to which I have referred?—None whatever; one merely found that there were people leading a cœnobitical life; there was nothing on the face of of the deed to show any illegality that I saw, and I did not doubt that it was a perfectly charitable and proper purpose.

3988. Mr. Pemberton.] Was it in one property?—There were two gifts, and two sets of trusts.

3989. Mr. Newdegate.] Do you share the opinion expressed by Mr. Erle, that a convent of one of the contemplative orders would not be a charity?—I think he expressed a doubt about it in his evidence; I was looking at it last night.

3990. In your own opinion, supposing there were not connected with a convent any object of relief of distress and sickness, any objects of education, any objects of a beneficial kind to any portion of the community except the inmates, and that the orders was cloistered, to use one expression, or contemplative, should you, or should you not, consider that a charitable property in the sense in which the chapels and schools of the Roman Catholic community are so considered?—I can conceive cases in which a good deal of difficulty would arise, and, of course, in every case you would require to see what is the exact tenor of the trusts before pronouncing whether it was a charity or not; now in the cases that you mentioned, where there was some eleemosynary or educational object attached, I suppose nobody would doubt that it was a charity; I can conceive cases where the benefit is confined so purely to the present inmates of a house, that it would be exactly like the Athenæum Club, and that it would not be a charity. One must put the case specifically in order to give any opinion. I will take a case like this; I will suppose that I give property to maintain a household of 12 women, who shall live a life of poverty, of chastity, of prayer, of fasting, and of contemplation, and I will add that they shall do so, in order to illustrate the glory of God, and the excellence of His Catholic Church. I have no doubt that that would be a charity, and I think it would be so, even if I cut away those last words.

3991. In order that I may request you to explain that answer, I would put this to you: you have assumed that there is a property for the maintenance of these cloistered nuns (for that is the common designation), but if that property had never been their own, would not their participation in that property be participation in an eleemosynary sense, and if it was participation in an eleemosynary sense, would not that constitute the convent a charity?—Yes; any element of alms would at once bring in the necessary legal conclusion that the thing was a charity.

3992. Chairman.] I do not think that your answer quite applies to the question, because the honourable Member does not speak of people in need, but merely speaks of a bequest; it hardly assumes the character of alms; it is a gift or bequest to persons not engaged in any charitable object, though it may be a religious object, and the question is, whether that is a charity?—I think if it is to promote a religious object that is a charity. I conceive that under the Statute of Elizabeth a religious object is as good a charity as any other, and that where the object of the donor is to promote religion, although his gift may be used in other ways, it is a perfectly good charitable gift.

3993. Mr. Newdegate.] Are you aware that in the Act of 1860, there is a recital of the clauses forbidding the male orders of the Church of Rome; perhaps you will have the kindness to read the 7th section?—There is no recital there; the words are, "Nothing in this Act contained shall be taken to repeal or in any way alter any provisions of an Act passed in the 10th year of his late Majesty King George the Fourth, intituled, 'An Act for the relief of His Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects, respecting the suppression or prohibition of the religious orders or societies of the Church of Rome bound by monastic or religious vows.'" I have no doubt it is such expressions as those in Acts of Parliament that have given me that general impression that exists in my mind that vows are the turning point.

3994. You have not read with a view to that clause the Relief Act of 1829?—No, I have not.

3995. Mr. Pemberton.] I think you said that you considered that in proportion to the number of Roman Catholics in England the number of their charities brought under your attention had been rather few?—I think so; one guesses at the number in England, but one knows it to be considerable.

3996. Do you not think it desirable that anything which checks their bringing forward their charities under your jurisdiction should be removed?—I think so; I think that publicity and regularity of control is desirable for all persons alike.

3997. And you think it advantageous probably that all the charities in the kingdom, of whatever religious denomination they may be, should be under the same supervision?—I think so; one may take an unduly official view of it, but I think so; I think it has been very beneficial hitherto in the organisation of charities and their control.

3998. And you have hinted that two of the reasons that you think operate on Roman Catholics to prevent that; one reason is usage which probably will wear off in course of time?—Yes.

3999. The other is the statutory disability?—The actual fear of the deprivation of property or litigation.

4000. Do not you think it is desirable that those disabilities should be removed, and that those doubts should be removed?—That the doubts should be removed seems to me most desirable, and that that is a point on which people could hardly differ. Whether all the disabilities should be removed is, of course, a much wider question of policy. I cannot help thinking that there are vexatious disabilities which are imposed upon Roman Catholics which any revision of the law would at once remove. Whether or no persons whose consciences are bound by strict vows should be placed on the same footing as other members of the society who are freer is a wide question of policy on which I am not quite prepared to offer an opinion; but I think that great steps should be taken in the direction of removing the disabilities.

4001. It will possibly or probably be the duty of the Committee, besides reporting on the state of the law, to report on any change which they might recommend, and I think they would be glad of the opinion of a gentleman of your experience on the subject. In the first place, would you see any objection, as a charity commissioner, to any disabilities being removed which prevent persons taking perpetual vows?—My experience as a charity commissioner in particular I do not think think gives me much ground to form an opinion upon that particular point.

Mr. A. Hobhouse.

4002. May I ask you as an individual?—Yes; I think that though the question is not without doubt, the taking of vows is a matter on which people ought to judge for themselves, and that if they were treated afterwards as ordinary members of society (always providing that the vows shall not be legally binding), and subjected to no disability on that account, it would be better.

4003. And so with respect to what are called superstitious uses, for instance, charities founded for the support of prayers for the dead, obits, and other things of that sort?—I should myself very much prefer that the whole law of superstitious uses should be abolished, to speak rather roughly; that is to say, that persons should be quite at liberty to judge for themselves what is and what is not a superstitious use, and that no use should be illegal excepting that which clearly violates the law of the land. It is much easier to illustrate what one means by giving instances than by speaking in general terms. I will take an extreme case, and suppose that there was a society of Thugs in operation; I should not wish that to be legalised, and I should not wish anybody to be allowed to leave property for supporting the Thugs; and yet there is no doubt that it is a religious society, that they worship their goddess (who has got some heathenish name which I cannot now recollect), and that they perform their horrible acts as acts of religious worship. But if persons think that prayers for the dead are edifying, though it happens that I do not think so myself, and I belong to a community which in general does not think so, I cannot help fancying that it violates no moral law, that it violates no rule of reason whatever, and that persons who think that it is edifying are edified by it; and I would much rather leave them at liberty to conduct their worship in their own way, and (subject to the laws affecting all endowments) to give endowments to conduct their worship in their own way; it makes them more religious, and I do not see why they should not be left to do that which they think fit, in the same way that we of the Church of England, or Protestant dissenters, are left.

4004. You would not object to legalise the charities that were good according to the doctrine of any religious community, as long as they were not contrary to general morality?—Just so. It is difficult to be quite accurate; besides "general morality" one ought to say, "to any positive law formed for the general safeguard of society." Now I will take a case that occurred the other day in the Court of Chancery. Some person left a fund for delivering from prison poachers and persons who had offended against the game laws. That person had a very strong feeling against one particular law, but no doubt the effect of the gift was to relieve criminals, and I think most of us would allow that that is an object we should not desire to see endowments for.

4005. Was there a judicial decision on that?—Yes, there was at the Rolls; it was decided to be illegal. On the other hand, you are aware of the Joanna Southcote case.

4006. Chairman.] Was there an endowment there?—An endowment was left for the purpose of propagating the writings and religious tenets of Joanna Southcote, and that endowment took effect in the year 1860. How many adherents of Joanna Southcote there were then I do not know, but I remember reading in the "Encyclopædia Britannica" in 1866, that there was then only one person in England who held the tenets of Joanna Southcote. She was dead, and you are aware of her great tenet; she thought that she was to be the mother of the Messiah. Of course with her death, her whole system fell to the ground, and yet it was held that that was a perfectly good charity.

4007. Did the one follower get the benefit of it?—Luckily there was a Chancery suit which absorbed the whole of the assets lawfully bequeathed to charity.

4008. Had it come under the Charity Commission, that property would have been safe?—I think it very likely.

4009. You would have admitted its title to be administered under your authority?—Yes, we should have had to make a scheme; but where there is endowment, there will be followers. We have a charity in our office at this present moment, for persons who, if I remember right, call themselves the real Sabbatarians; they observe the Sabbath on the Saturday instead of the Sunday. I believe that they are simply kept alive by the endowment.

4010. Is that a charity?—Yes.

4011. Mr. Pemberton.] Probably their object is to get two holidays in the week?—That may be so; I mention these instances to show the extreme liberty which we allow in every direction, thinking it better to allow even these crotchets to people, than to deprive persons of a liberty which they may exercise very usefully for society.

4012. The last witness seemed to entertain some doubt as to an institution coming under the Charity Commission, on the ground that it had only recently been founded; but that doubt is erroneous, is it not?—Yes.

4013. Any charity founded, even to-morrow, could be under your Commission?—Yes, the moment that a charity is endowed it comes under the Commission; subject to the exempted cases.

4014. Mr. Bourke.] About vows; supposing it came under your knowledge when they applied to you, that persons who were to take the benefit of the charity were bound by vow, what would you do in such a case?—One would carefully examine the law upon the subject, and see whether they were in a position which made them obnoxious to the law, and whether, therefore, a gift for the purpose of maintaining that position was an invalid gift.

4015. Then you would inquire into the nature of their vows?—Yes, we should make all such inquiries as were necessary for that purpose; we should look at the Acts of Parliament, see how they bore upon them, and ask the applicants to supply us with such facts as would enable us to come to a decision.

4016. I suppose you can hardly tell the Committee the character of the vows that you think would disentitle them to come under the Charity Commission?—I could not tell it with any preciseness of definition. I could mention special vows; I should say that for a young man to take a vow of perpetual celibacy was usually a great great evil, and a thing that the law ought not to hold binding. Whether it should hold gifts made to persons who had taken those vows invalid is a totally different question. I have expressed the opinion that it would be better to allow the gifts as freely as other endowments, but I coupled that with a statement that there were

s which I thought so prejudicial that the law ght to make them not binding on the indi- ual, but that he should be at liberty to retreat n them. You will understand that there are senses of the word illegality, and there is a stant confusion in discussing these questions legal gifts between those two senses. There n illegality in the sense of an act being an al offence against law, and there is an ille- ty in the sense of an act being generally con- y to the policy of the law, so that the law will actively support it. I will just illustrate the t by the common case of covenants in restraint rade. We all know that there are such things, that they are called, loosely speaking, ille- ; that is to say, that if you go into a court law to enforce such a covenant, the court of will not enforce it, because it is against policy. there is no illegality in the sense of offending inst the law; and by making that covenant incur no penalty. And that is the distinc- which I wish to be borne in mind here. It be very proper to hold vows illegal in the se that they shall not be enforced in courts of , without making them illegal in any other se.

4017. I wish to put the case of an oratory. oratory is an institution of secular priests. w, taking into consideration that all priests the Roman Catholic religion are bound by vs of celibacy and obedience to their superior, posing that there was a charity in favour of secular priests living together, bound by those vs, what would you say to that?—I imagine t it would be illegal under the present law; impression is so, but you must take all se impressions as being of a very imperfect racter.

4018. What view would the Charity Com- ssioners take of it?—All I can say is, that we uld study the case very carefully before ex- ssing any view.

4019. Mr. G. Gregory] You were examined to that Charitable Trusts Act, and how it ought the Roman Catholic charities under your isdiction. It is provided by that Act, I think, at in the absence of any other evidence the age of the last 20 years shall prevail in the erpretation of the trust?—Yes.

4020. That is in the absence of other evidence the contrary?—In the absence of other written idence to the contrary. It is to exclude the idence of prior parole testimony for peace ke.

4021. You were giving an illustration of what uld be a charity, and you said, as I under- od, that a donation for the purpose of a com- on fund, for the purpose of maintaining a certain mber of persons living together for religious rposes of worship, would be a charity?—I think 4022. And, as I took your illustration, it did t differ very much from the case of an ordinary mshouse?—No; I think that there are alms- uses which hardly differ from the case that I entioned; and that is one of the reasons for my inion. There are almshouses where the in- ates need not be very poor; where the element religion enters quite as much as the element of verty into the founder's notion.

4023. Some of those are in your jurisdiction? Yes.

4024. Your jurisdiction is increasing daily I ink; I mean the property brought under it? 0.92.—The number of persons who apply to us is increasing.

4025. And I think you have a large number of cases of property vested in your inspectors?—Yes; there is a considerable amount of land, I cannot tell how much, and about 4,000,000*l.* of stock; official trustees is the right term.

4026. Mr. O'Reilly.] You said, in answer to Mr. Bourke, that in your opinion, a gift to a number of secular Roman Catholic priests living together would be void, because they were all bound by a practical vow of celibacy and of obedience to their ecclesiastical superiors; if that opinion be correct, would not all gifts to Roman Catholic priests, as such, be void?—I think that you a little altered the nature of Mr. Bourke's question, and my answer. The question, as I understood it, was whether a gift to a number of persons, who were actually bound by vows, would be illegal; not of persons who had practically, but of persons who had actually, come under vows. That I believe to be an act against the law, and therefore a gift to maintain and strengthen that act would also be against the law; but if there is no such act against the law; if there are merely 12 persons living together, with some private understanding, not capable of reduction into any undertaking cognisable as an ecclesiastical offence by their own church, I should conceive that such a society as that might be the subject of gifts, and that those persons might exist together without any violation of the law.

4027. I will put to you, what is in fact the case of all Roman Catholic priests, and ask you to see whether it does not come under the description which you have just given; every Roman Catholic priest when he is ordained enters into a solemn undertaking by the very act to observe perpetual celibacy during his life, and he takes an oath of obedience in fitting matters to his ecclesiastical superiors, in the usual canon language, to the bishop or ordinary of the place; now as you have stated it, would not your description just now of persons to whom a gift would be illegal, include that description of Roman Catholic priests?—I do not think that it would; my impression is that the thing that is rendered illegal is a society of these persons bound by vows; but you must always remember that in examining me on the subject, you are examining me on a subject which I do not profess to have studied.

4028. You mentioned that as far as your opinion could go, you thought that Roman Catholics did not very largely enrol their charitable trusts since 1860?—I believe that they have enrolled a great number; but that we as Charity Commissioners have nothing to do with; that is a separate process.

4029. You very naturally attributed that both to distrust originated by old custom, and to the certainty of some trusts being illegal, and a doubt as to others?—Yes.

4030. Have you any knowledge on which to found an opinion whether they freely enrol trusts, of the legality of which there is no doubt at all, and declare them so as to bring them under your knowledge?—No, I have not.

4031. The reason I ask the question is this, that a paper has been put in by Mr. Kingston, of the Rolls Office, giving the number of enrolments, which he considered, from the terms referred to Roman Catholic trusts in the years 1867, 1868, 1869, and 1870, or a period of four years, and I find that in those years there were

Mr. A. Hobhouse.

13 enrolments of trusts to which the Right Rev. Dr. Grant, who was, until very lately, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Southwark, was a party; showing that in that district, which is not a large one, which is called the Roman Catholic Diocese of Southwark, in four years there was an enrolment of 13 of these charitable trusts; these all appear to be for the purposes of churches and similar purposes, which are clearly legal; would not that rather tend to show that the Roman Catholics did enrol, tolerably freely, at least, charitable trusts, of the legality of which there was no doubt?—I should think it would, as to the enrolment; but of the enrolment I know nothing, and it is a formal act; there is no significance in it at all.

4032. It would be an advantage, would it not, to Roman Catholics that their bequests might be freely declared without any danger of illegality, in order that, if there was a misapplication or a doubt as to the rightful application, they might be able freely to make application to your body of Commissioners?—I should think so. If I were a Roman Catholic I should like it.

4033. And also, in many instances, it would be a great advantage to them, would it not, to assist in changes connected with the property?—Yes; there are certain administrative powers, powers of leasing, sale, mortgage, and so forth, very convenient to exercise, which cannot be exercised except with the consent of the Charity Commissioners.

4034. You have stated, and other witnesses have agreed with you, that certain trusts would be certainly illegal, in consequence of being applied to superstitious uses or to monasteries of men; and that another large class would be of doubtful legality, as referring to convents of women; as a lawyer, would you not, so that a lawyer would always advise his clients in the case of doubtful legalities, to avoid all risk by not declaring the trusts of anything that was doubtful?—Clearly so.

4035. Mr. Sherlock.] In reference to that establishment at St. Leonards, I understand that you conceived that you had jurisdiction in that case over both branches, by reason of the close connection between the one that was purely charitable and clearly within your jurisdiction, and the other which was occupied by persons who superintended and managed that charitable institution; am I right in that?—That, probably, would have made it clear even if it were not clear otherwise; but we considered that it was a mixed educational and religious purpose, and it did not occur to us to entertain any serious doubt but that it fell within the Charitable Trusts Act, and it occurred to nobody else; so the question was never discussed.

4036. But there was that mixture of charity and education in both branches which brought it within your jurisdiction as in thought?—There was that mixture; the religious society superintended the education.

4037. There was that mixture which rendered it inevitable for you to consider both together, for the educational object without the supplement of the religious society, who superintended and managed the educational department, could not very well have been carried out?—It was the scheme of the foundation that the society should superintend the school.

4038. And thus, even upon those grounds the property could not have been segregated; you could scarcely have declared the one charita and ordered it to be conveyed, and have l your hand and declined to interfere in regar the other?—I daresay that there would h been a difficulty even on that ground.

4039. I understand you to have expres your opinion with regard to the fifth section the Act of 1860, that it would not be judici in your opinion to extend it to other chariti you do not see that particular advantage in that in your opinion would render it judicious extend it?—My impression is, that the rule present applied is a very good one, and wo with great freedom and ease, and I rather th that in cases of perpetuities it is best not to h that very arbitrary rule of 20 years.

4040. Will you allow me to suggest to you practical advantage in the omission of that ru that if in any other institution not being Rom Catholic you had clear evidence of a previ user, which in your opinion as one of the Co missioners would be better adapted for general purposes than the continued user of years, whilst you would have it in your power ordinary cases to adopt that better and previ usage, you could not do it in the case of Rom Catholic charities?—I would not say that, cause you must remember that by the establi ment of a scheme the court has power to v details from time to time; you could not dep from the main principles of that which 20 ye usage establishes to be the very essence of foundation, but you could depart from vari particulars of usage on proper cause being shov by means of a scheme. The thing is done eve day in other charities.

4041. Still preserving the principle of the sign of the original foundation?—You must p serve the essence.

4043. Do you conceive that you have jurisd tion where the trusts are clear, apparent and w defined, to do otherwise by the scheme than ca out the very intention of the founders?— schemes, the details of the working of found tions are altered every week of the year.

4044. The scheme is but the mechanical car ing out of the intention expressed in the inst ment under which the property is held?—It i little more than the mechanical carrying out. is extremely difficult to define what the co may do and what it may not; and I do not kn that I can express it more precisely than I h done already by saying that you must keep the essence, but may alter the details; it be shown that you can further the main des better by some alteration of the details, you n alter those details.

4045. That is in furtherance of the origi intention with which the charity is founded Yes.

4046. Mr. Pemberton.] What I underst you to mean is this, that notwithstanding t clause which makes the 20 years' user take place of evidence, yet the power of the Court Chanc ncery to direct a scheme is not interfered ?—I read the clause so.

47. Mr. Sherlock.] Do you conceive that r court has got jurisdiction by any scheme to r the object and intention of the charity?—It one constantly with regard to the smaller and ordinate objects.

048. And do you do it by complete departure the object of the founder?—That is only re the main object has failed; but as I say, rule is that you preserve the essence and you alter the details.

049. That is in a case in which the Court of ncery would adopt the doctrine of cy-près?—, when the main object has failed.

050. That is where the main objects cannot be ried out?—Yes, but even where the objects e not failed it may be found that those parti- ar details which were prescribed by the founder not work well, and you do his business better altering those details.

051. But still you do his business?—Yes, do his business; he is the master of the ition.

052. Now, in your definition of a charity, in the application of your authority to reli- us objects, you keep in view, I presume, the atute of Elizabeth as the foundation of that rticular doctrine?—Yes.

053. Does it occur to you that the Statute of izabeth could not have had in view any reli- us opinions entertained by persons who may ve taken monastic vows in the Roman Catholic urch?—There is no trace of such a view, and I ve often wondered that in the Statute of lizabeth there is no mention of religious objects all; and it is only by judicial decisions that e is enabled to pronounce so confident an opi- on that a religious object is a charitable object; it the decisions have been perfectly clear for a ng series of years on that point.

054. You mentioned your opinion with regard the non-validity of bequests to any society of cular clergymen of the Roman Catholic Church, ecause they are subject to vows of obedience and libacy. You are aware, I suppose, of the de- sion in the case of Sims and Quinlan, and in reland?—No, the name is new to me.

055. The point was decided by the Court of hancery that a bequest for the purpose of edu- ating pupils for the Dominican Order was void n the ground that that order was one which was bnoxious to the 10th Geo. 4. Now, bearing at in mind, and the ground of that decision, I sk you whether you are aware that a similar be- uest of landed property, or demise of landed roperty for the purpose of educating students theology with the view of becoming secular lergymen has been always upheld?—Not always, ut I think it has been upheld since the removal f the Roman Catholic disabilities.

056. Are you aware that a large portion of the roperty held by the College of Maynooth, was iven to them by the will of Lord Dunboyne, who ad been a bishop in the Roman Catholic Church, nd afterwards became a Protestant, and that it as granted for the special purpose of educating hildren for the Roman Catholic priesthood?—o; but I am not surprised to hear it, because y strong impression is, that gifts to support a cular priest are perfectly valid.

057. But there were gifts for education in oth cases?—Of secular priests. I can refer you to a case where that was held, the case of the Attorney General against Gladstone, a recent case decided by Vice Chancellor Shadwell, and afterwards by Lord Lyndhurst; the gift seems to have been for the education of Roman Catholic priests.

4058. Mr. Newdegate.] You have stated that you think it is possible that it might be advantageous that the law against superstitious uses should be repealed; are you aware that one of the principal objects of the Statute of 1860 was to enable the Charity Commissioners and the Court of Chancery to purge any deeds that might be submitted to them by trustees from any taint on account of their offending against the Statute which is against superstitious uses?—I am aware that there is a very important clause, or a clause of great apparent importance (for it has never been used) in that Act, which seems to me to be made in favour of the Roman Catholics. The provision is, that the appearance of a superstitious use as one of the objects of a gift shall not invalidate the whole gift; but that it shall be in the power of the tribunal, to whom the power is committed, to apportion the property between the superstitious use and the good uses, and then to declare new uses in lieu of the superstitious use.

4059. That is a very important power, is it not?—It might be, if it had been used, but it has never been used.

4060. The power is important, whether used or not?—It is a considerable power.

4061. Then are you not aware that the Legislature has held that the objection to devises or gifts of property for the purpose of maintaining those who will professionally pray for the dead, is that, whereas the dead die once, this use may go on for ever in violation of the principle of the law of mortmain?—I do not know what the view of the Legislature was, but I am quite aware of the importance of the principle that you are adverting to, and, to my mind, it is a principle against the permanence of all endowments, and does not affect one more than the other.

4062. It is a principle that has been repeatedly recognised by the laws of this country, both before and since the Reformation, has it not, that endowments which will maintain persons professedly for the purpose of saying prayers for the dead are apt more than others to tend to violations of the law against mortmain?—I am not aware that that is the principle on which they were held illegal. I think not. I think it was a change of theological view.

4063. Are you aware that previous to the Reformation many of the oratories were suppressed?—Yes, I am perfectly aware of that; they were great objects of hostility.

4064. You are aware that that was one of the earliest proceedings towards the re-assertion of the principal of mortmain by the State?—No, I do not think so; I do not think that it had anything to do with the law of mortmain.

4065. Are you aware that these oratories were suppressed under the brief obtained by Cardinal Wolsey, in the reign of Henry the Eighth?—No; I fancied that, besides Wolsey's brief, their suppression was authorised by an Act of Parliament; and with great deference, I think that Wolsey did a very illegal act, and that he, and those who acted under him, were liable to be hung if they did that without an Act of Parliament.

Mr. A. Hobhouse.

21 July 1870.

4066. You are not aware that the suppression of the oratories and smaller convents was accomplished by the authority of the Crown in support of a brief obtained from the Pope of Rome?—No, I am not; it may be the fact, but my strong impression is, that there is an Act of Parliament for the purpose; and I think that I can find it if I have time to look for it; but I have no doubt that you have looked into the matter, and know it more accurately than I do. You are right, I believe. The Act I was thinking of is that of 31 Hen. 8, c. 13, which I thought had extended to all the irregular transactions between the religious houses and the Crown, but it does only extend back to the year 1535. The view here expressed of the illegality of Wolsey's conduct was shared by the lawyers of the day and by subsequent writers. One of the general accusations against Wolsey is, that he endeavoured to govern without Parliaments (Burnet's Ref. vol. 1, part 1, p. 15). And one of the points on which he was impeached was this very practice of procuring Bulls from Rome (Ibid., p. 161).

4067. Mr. Bourke.] Do you know an Act of 1 Geo. 1, s. 2, c. 50?—No, I never saw that Act.

Monday, 25th July 1870.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Thomas Chambers.
Mr. George Gregory.
Mr. Newdegate.
Sir John Ogilvy.
Mr. O'Reilly.
Mr. Sherlock.
Mr. Villiers.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE CHARLES PELHAM VILLIERS, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. CHARLES EDWARDS FREEMAN, called in; and Examined.

Mr. C. E. Freeman.
25 July 1870.

4068. Chairman.] I BELIEVE you are acting as Solicitor for a community or religious society in the neighbourhood of Windsor?—Yes.

4069. What is the description of that society?—It is called the House of Mercy; but the religious part of the society is called St. John's Sisterhood, that is, the Sisterhood of St. John the Baptist.

4070. Where is the House of Mercy situated?—At Clewer, near Windsor. There are two institutions in one. The House of Mercy is an institution for the reception and restoration of fallen women, and the work of the house is done by the Sisters of St. John the Baptist, who are a religious sisterhood in connection with the Church of England.

4071. And who live in the neighbourhood?—In the house, at least a portion of them. About 20 of the sisters live in the house, and there are about 80 altogether.

4072. How is this community composed?—The community is composed of the warden, superior, and sisters. There are two orders of sisters, choir and lay sisters, and sisters of the second order.

4073. Are they all ladies? — They are all ladies, except the lay sisters.

4074. What is the meaning of the term warden?—The warden is a clergyman of the Church of England.

4075. And is the minister of a neighbouring parish?—Yes, he is the rector of the parish of Clewer, the Rev. Thomas Thellusson Carter.

4076. How long has this society been constituted?— The society has been constituted, I think, about 18 years.

4077. How is it maintained?—The House of Mercy is maintained by voluntary contributions; the sisterhood by the sisters. There are some funds invested for the benefit of the sisterhood.

4078. Were there funds raised before the establishment?— No, none. They have all been given since by sisters.

4079. Were these persons ladies of independent fortune originally associated together?—I do not know that they had independent fortunes; some of them had means and some had not.

4080. But since they have been established they have acquired property?—Yes; the sisterhood has.

4081. Have you any objection to state whether they possess land?—I have no objection at all. The House of Mercy and the adjoining land belongs to the trustees of the House of Mercy. There are also some trustees who have some land belonging to the sisters.

4082. Do you distinguish the sisters from the rest of the community?—I distinguish the sisterhood of St. John the Baptist from the House of Mercy. Property is held for each institution.

4083. Are they different trustees?—They are different trustees. The warden, superior, and treasurers are the trustees of the sisterhood; and the trustees of the House of Mercy are different persons, and they are trustees only.

4084. These trustees hold the land for the purposes of the society, I presume?—Yes, for the purposes mentioned in the statutes and rules of the society.

4085. They have rules?— The sisters have rules, and the House of Mercy has statutes of its own.

4086. And do these rules and statutes set forth the purposes of this community?—Yes.

4087. And the obligations into which they respectively enter?—Yes.

4088. Are they private, or are they known?—I believe that the rules of the sisterhood are private, but the statutes of the House of Mercy are privately circulated.

4089. Are they printed?—Yes.

4090. If we required it, could we see them?—Yes, I could send the Committee a copy if they required it.

4091. Who has drawn up these rules?—The statutes of the House of Mercy were drawn up by the council, or by some barrister, on behalf of the council; the rules of the sisterhood under the directions of the warden.

4092. Are they submitted to any ecclesiastical authority?—Yes, the bishop is visitor.

4093. What bishop?—The Bishop of Oxford; the late Bishop of Oxford was visitor.

4094. Mr. Newdegate.] Is the present Bishop of Oxford visitor now?—Yes, the present bishop is visitor, and he has approved of the late statutes, which were altered whilst the late bishop was bishop of the diocese.

4095. Chairman.] The visitor approves these rules, which are secret, as I understand you?—I do not know that they are secret; they are private documents, but I do not think that they would object to the Committee having a copy.

4096. Do they contribute anything?—Each sister who is able to do so, contributes 50*l.* a year, but if a sister is unable to contribute that herself, that sum is made up out of the community fund for her.

Mr. C. E. Freeman.

4097. Do I rightly understand that they give up nothing on entering the community?—They give up nothing on entering; they make arrangements for the disposing of their property, and they do not deal with their money after entering the institution.

4098. On entering they make a disposition of all property that they have, or expect to have?—They do not make any legal disposition of it, but there is an understanding that as they receive money, so it is disposed of. The 50*l.*, or whatever annual sum the sisters may arrange to contribute, is paid into the fund, and is disposed of according to the directions of each sister.

4099. They are not under any obligation to pay to the common fund, whatever they may receive after joining?—No.

4100. But is it the arrangement, or one of the rules, that they shall not hold any property for their own benefit?—Yes.

4101. Is it like a declaration or vow of poverty?—Yes, no doubt, but the sisters take no life vows.

4102. They take no formal vow, binding themselves to poverty?—There are no formal life vows.

4103. But it is understood that they shall not employ any moneys or properties that they may receive for their own purposes, after they have joined?—Yes.

4104. But with respect to their actual disposition of that the sisterhood have nothing to do?—Nothing whatever; of course the sisters can, if they think fit, give more than the 50*l.* a year to the common fund, and some do, I believe.

4105. Are there various modes of living within the society?—No.

4106. It is a common life for all?—Yes.

4107. And has the superior contributed more than the rest, or had she anything to do with the original foundation?—Yes, I think she had; she has contributed more than some other sisters.

4108. Has she any power over the common fund?—None whatever; it is in the hands of the council of finance.

4109. And it could not be used for any purpose without the assent of the council of finance?—No.

4110. What is that council of finance composed of?—It is composed of the superior, the assistant superior, and five sisters, who are elected annually.

4111. And there is no money belonging to the community that is spent without their sanction?—None whatever.

4112. They derive their income from contributions?—From contributions of the sisters, and from other contributions.

4113. Are those persons who annually subscribe to the support of the society ascertained?—No, I know of no list of them; there is a private list of the subscribers to the House of Mercy.

4114. But the society receive voluntary gifts?—Yes.

4115. And property which was bequeathed to them by will would be bequeathed to the trustees?—Yes, to the warden, superior, and treasurers.

4116. Have you had any instance of bequests made to the society itself?—None to the sisterhood of St. John the Baptist; there have been bequests made to the House of Mercy.

4117. And in those terms?—To the trustees of the House of Mercy, for the purposes of that institution. There is a form of bequest at the end of the statutes.

4118. But whoever might have been the testator, he was aware of that form, and the will was made legally?—Either he was aware of it, or else he laid down the trusts according to his own idea in the will.

4119. But if a bequest was made to the society itself, could it be enjoyed and taken without any reference to trustees, or to particular individuals to hold in trust; what would be your view of a bequest of that kind to that society?—I am not sure how far the society itself has any legal standing whatever. I take it that it must be left to the trustees for the benefit of the society. I do not know how the society could give a receipt for the money.

4120. You do not know of an instance having occurred in which that question was raised?—I do not.

4121. Has this society any charter?—None whatever.

4122. Has it applied, or does it contemplate applying, for a charter of incorporation?—I have not heard that it does.

4123. Would there be any convenience to it in having one?—No doubt.

4124. Would it be chiefly a convenience for the purpose of receiving property?—Yes; and it would be convenient, of course, to avoid the appointment of new trustees on the death of trustees, or any change.

4125. What is the number of trustees?—I think that there are four; the bishop is one.

4126. Are they all ecclesiastics?—No; Mr. Gladstone is one, the Bishop of Winchester, the Rev. Mr. Coleridge, and the Rev. Mr. Carter.

4127. And is that number kept up?—If one were to die there would be a new appointment.

4128. Do the rules stipulate that there are not to be less than three trustees?—There is no stipulation of that kind in the statutes, but the council would not allow the funds to be in the hands of less than three.

4129. Do they hold absolutely the land that has been conveyed to the society?—Yes, these trustees hold some land in particular in the Isle of Wight, and also the Clewer House of Mercy. "To the trustees, their heirs and assigns for ever" as to the Clewer House of Mercy, "upon trust for the benefit of this institution;" and the same as to the land in the Isle of Wight. There is some other land which is held by the same trustees for the benefit of a convalescent hospital, called St. Andrew's Hospital, close by the House of Mercy, and in that case the property is vested in the trustees, and there are no trusts declared.

4130. And in what way are the proceeds of that property applied?—They are applied to the reception of persons who come from the hospitals before they are completely recovered; they stop there a certain time for the partial recovery of their health, and then they go back to their friends.

4131. And who has the application of that money?—The application of the money is in the hands of the council of St. Andrew's Hospital.

4132. I understand that the property, in the first place, is conveyed to trustees?—The hospital is conveyed to the trustees of the House of Mercy, no trust being declared. That hospital does not belong to the Sisterhood of St. John the Baptist, but to the House of Mercy.

4133. Who

4133. Who apply the proceeds; the trustees or the council?—The council apply the proceeds. The cheques are drawn by the treasurer, I believe, but the accounts are submitted to the council, and they approve of what has been done from time to time.

4134. Is there an annual publication of the accounts?—Yes; I have one here.

4135. Is there any auditor of these accounts?—They are audited by two members of the council, who are not treasurers.

4136. That is to say, the accounts are submitted to the council, and audited by the council?—They are audited by two members of the council previously to the meeting of the council, and then they are submitted to the council itself.

4137. This is a society for religious purposes?—No, for purposes of mercy and benevolence. In regard to St. Andrew's Hospital, the council are all to be communicants of the Church of England.

4138. Is it in the rules or statutes that they must belong to the Church of England?—Yes; it is in the statutes; they must be half clergymen and half laymen.

4139. What council are you now speaking of?—Of the council of the House of Mercy, and of the council of St. Andrew's Hospital, which is different, although some persons are members of each council.

4140. I thought you said that the council consisted of five sisters?—That is the council of the Sisterhood of St. John the Baptist, which is a separate thing entirely.

4141. Is there any rule which precludes their changing their views on the subject of religion, or as to the forms of worship?—I do not know that there is, any more than that they are to be communicants of the Church of England. The warden must be a priest of the Church of England.

4142. But if they chose, and were so minded, they might change their persuasion, I suppose?—No, I should say not; I think the rules would prevent that entirely; it is strictly a Church of England institution, there is no doubt.

4143. Would the bishop have any authority to interfere?—Yes, because certain rules are defined as being fundamental, and the fundamental rules cannot be altered without the consent of the visitor, who is the bishop.

4144. And is it one of the rules that the visitor or the warden must be a bishop of the Church of England?—No; whenever there is a vacancy in the office of visitor, it is to be first offered to the bishop of the diocese; if he will not take it, then they would appoint some other visitor. The warden must be a priest of the Church of England.

4145. You might have, as visitor, a Roman Catholic bishop, if the bishop of the diocese did not take it?—Certainly not; I should say that that would be quite impossible according to the rules and statutes. The preamble to the statutes provides distinctly and expressly that the institution is to be preserved "always unchanged and inviolate, and conducted and carried on in accordance with the true Christian faith as it is set forth in the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England."

4146. That question has not arisen yet?—No.

4147. You did not state the amount that was invested, I think; can you tell us what it is?—I think it is about 3,000 l. belonging to the community fund, that is to the sisterhood. Then there is some 500 l. or 600 l. belonging to the House of Mercy, and also an estate of life in the Isle of Wight, worth about 400 l. or 500 l. principal, which brings in about 24 l. or 25 l. a year.

4148. Does this estate gradually increase?—No, I think not. Of course, by gifts it would do so.

4149. But there is no limit to the amount that they could receive if more was offered?—No; if it was given, there is no limit.

4150. No arrangement about poverty precludes their receiving any amount by gift?—It would prevent individuals from receiving it.

4151. Are they put to great expense in the works that they are in the habit of performing?—Yes, great expenses are incurred; but whatever expenses are incurred are paid by the community.

4152. But did you mean the Committee to understand that there was any hospital, or any number of sick, that they attend?—Yes; there is a convalescent hospital.

4153. Is that supported at their expense?—No; that is a separate institution entirely; it is supported by voluntary contributions, but there is a yearly deficiency of a considerable amount, from 400 l. to 500 l., which is made up out of the Community Fund of the sisterhood.

4154. What connection is there between the sisterhood and such a hospital as that?—The sisterhood do the work in it, and attend the sick who are there.

4155. But do they attend to them as sick, or do they attend to afford them religious consolation?—The warden attends to the religious duties of the hospital; there are services in the hospital conducted by the warden and sub-warden of the House of Mercy.

4156. There are no religious offices that this sisterhood performs?—Not in connection with the patients.

4157. In connection with the poor in the neighbourhood?—Yes; no doubt they visit the sick in the parish.

4158. Do you mean, not to administer medicine, but to communicate with them as religious people?—Under the direction of the clergy of the parish; it is one of the express rules that the sisters must work under the direction of the clergy.

4159. Could not they visit the sick or poor without the leave of the clergy?—No; nor without the leave of the incumbent of any parish into which they might go.

4160. That is a rule which they have bound themselves to obey?—Yes.

4161. If they were so disposed, I presume, there would be nothing to prevent their visiting whom they liked?—The rule would prevent their having any regular visitation in any parish without the consent of the clergyman of the parish.

4162. They only visit Protestant sick, I suppose?—They visit anybody, I suppose, with the consent of the clergy. I do not know why you should confine what they have to do to Protestants.

4163. Could they visit the poor of any other persuasion than their own?—No doubt.

4164. And you believe that they do so?—I have no doubt about it. They would visit anyone who was sick or distressed.

Mr. C. E. Freeman.

25 July 1870.

4165. I believe this institution is frequently visited by people for the purpose of seeing it?—Very commonly.

4166. There is nothing secret about it?—On the contrary, the superior and the warden would be very anxious that everybody should know all about it.

4167. Are they chiefly persons of a certain age, or what are called elderly ladies that live in this society?—I think they cannot join until 30 without consents of parents.

4168. But I suppose there is no limit as to age; there are old and young?—There are old and young, but most of the old ones have been there a good many years.

4169. I suppose any of the sisterhood might withdraw when they chose from the sisterhood?—The sisters take no vows. I do not know whether they feel that they would be at liberty to withdraw whenever they chose.

4170. I think you said that they could not take away any property that they brought in?—They do not bring in any property above 50 l. a year each, or such other annual sum as each may arrange to contribute.

4171. But they would be allowed to give offerings to the community if they chose, would they not?—No doubt.

4172. But anything of that sort so given could not be taken away by a sister withdrawing?—It would be all spent.

4173. Do you mean that when any sum is given to this community they immediately spend it?—That is the custom. There is about 3,000 l. invested now, as I told you.

4174. But there is nothing to preclude further investment, is there?—Nothing whatever.

4175. And I suppose the land was purchased by moneys contributed in some way?—The land was purchased by moneys contributed by the public and the sisters.

4176. Have they a chapel inside the institution?—Yes.

4177. They do not attend any neighbouring church?—No, the sisters generally attend the services at their own chapel; some few go to the parish church.

4178. That chapel is a regular church, I suppose, and has been consecrated?—I am not sure whether it has been legally consecrated; I suppose it has.

4179. Do people come from without to attend it?—No, it is a private chapel; I think now it has not been legally consecrated.

4180. Are the services performed by the warden?—By the warden and the sub-warden.

4181. The sisters do not superintend any schools, I suppose?—Yes, several schools, all over England.

4182. These sisters then do not always dwell at Clewer?—Not the whole of them; there are about 20 in the house generally.

4183. Do you know what the whole number is?—Abont 80; 48 or 49 choir sisters.

4184. Then there are about 30 generally away?—Yes.

4185. And how would you generally describe their business when they are away?—They are engaged in works of mercy in England and abroad.

4186. Have they any branches in communication or correspondence with them?—Yes, several.

4187. In England, or out of England?—Both.

4188. Is this Clewer society the parent society?—Yes, that is the chief house.

4189. Would you have any objection to tell us where these branches are?—No; they have at Clewer, besides the hospital which I have explained to you, and the House of Mercy, an orphanage, which is for the reception of 25 orphan children, and 20 industrial girls; and they have a cottage, which they call St. Andrew's Cottage, which is on land immediately adjoining the hospital, where they receive a few invalid ladies whose means do not admit of their obtaining change of air for their health; also almshouses for 12 aged persons to reside in permanently.

4190. That is a distinct building?—That is a distinct building; they receive 10 there.

4191. Does any sister dwell on those premises?—Yes; then they attend to the schools at St. Stephen's Mission, which is in Windsor, in the immediate neighbourhood, in the parish of Clewer, but in the town of Windsor; and they also work St. John's School, at Bloomfield-place, Pimlico.

4192. What school is that?—That is a school for the children of the clergy and professional men.

4193. Not for poor children?—Not for poor children; they have a day-school also in Pimlico; and then they have an orphanage, St. Barnabas' Orphanage, at 7, Bloomfield-place, where they receive 30 children, and train them as servants or school teachers, the children paying 10 l. per annum each.

4194. Are these schools inspected, do you know, by the Government inspector?—I do not know that.

4195. They do not receive any portion of the education grant?—No, none whatever.

4196. Is there any visitor to these schools?—They are all under the clergy of the parish.

4197. They would be under the clergy of St. Barnabas?—Yes, or of any other parish in which the several schools may be situated. And then they have a mission in Rose-street, Soho-square, and an orphanage for 30 children.

4198. What is precisely a mission?—They are there for visiting the poor and sick; the sisters live in a house there, and visit the poor and sick in the parish.

4199. That is the establishment they have in that part of the town, and so many sisters live in it?—Yes, and they train 34 girls for servants who pay 12 l. per annum. Then they have some schools called St. Mary's Schools, at Rydal House, Folkestone, but these have been discontinued, and another Church of England sisterhood works there.

4200. What children do they train there?—It is a day-school, and the children pay four guineas per annum, and there are a few boarders at 25 guineas each.

4201. There are sisters there too, I suppose?—Yes. Then they had a mission-house in Radnor-street, Folkestone also, now given up; and they manage the Bovey Tracey House of Mercy, in Devonshire.

4202. What is the Bovey Tracey House in Devonshire?—It is a house of mercy similar to the house of mercy in Clewer.

4203. How many sisters dwell there?—I think there are only about 10 sisters there. The house was built to hold 70, but the funds only admit of their taking in 31.

4204. Are these branches maintained by the sisterhood of Clewer, or are they self-supporting in the districts where they exist?—They are ly self-supporting in the districts where they t; the persons who have to do with them are onsible for them. The sisterhood often make deficiencies.

205. Have the sisterhood any other institu- in any other part of England?—Yes; St. hael's House, at Torquay, which is a con- scent home, something similar to the hospital lewer; that is for women of good character vering from sickness, or delicate persons want sea air; they pay from 5*s.* to 8*s.* kly; and they also work at the House of rity in Soho-square.

206. What is the House of Charity?—It is nded to afford temporary board and lodging persons who may be in London, and need it; ants out of employment, and anybody who want a night's lodging or board would be to go to the House of Charity and get it.

207. Are there particular rules for each of these nch establishments?—Yes, rules of their own.

208. Rules that have been drawn up by the ent society?—No; the rules regulating the duct of the sisters in the branch establish- nts, of course, are rules of this society; but rules relating to the institutions themselves , I suppose, made by the persons interested them, and who have got them up.

209. But those persons are the sisters, are y not?—No; the Bovey Tracey House of rcy, and some of these other institutions, were ginally begun by some persons interested in neighbourhood, and the sisters go there to rk and manage them.

210. Do these persons apply to the society at wer, and ask for the attendance of these ers?—Yes.

211. And is that given gratuitously on their t?—Yes.

212. And in all these societies you say there he security of the parish clergyman for their ng brought up in the doctrines of the Church England?—Yes; they cannot work in any ish without the consent and direction of the umbent of the parish. There is another insti- ion, the Oxford Female Penitentiary, at Ox- l; that is a similar institution to the House of rcy. Then there is a new mission recently ened in Baltimore, in America, about which I w very little at present.

213. Mr. O'Reilly.] Is that the only one out England?—Yes.

214. Chairman.] Are you able to give us information about that?—No; three or four ers are gone out, but there is nothing which nade public at present, as to what their work There is a house there for them, for an hanage, and they are going out to work in similar way to what they do in parishes in gland.

215. You say that that will be a similar insti- ion; you mean also a Protestant institution? An institution under the direction of the iscopal Church in America, I suppose.

216. Would it be the institution in Baltimore t would pay the expenses of these sisters ng out from England?—Yes.

217. How long is it since they have gone to ltimore?—I think that they sailed about two nths ago.

218. Do the sisters attend any of the societies the Continent?—No, I think not; it is con- ry to the rule to attend any other sisterhood.

219. Then Baltimore is an exception, because that is out of their country?—But the church in America is in communion with the churches of England.

220. I suppose that, so far as being Protestant goes, there are plenty of churches on the Continent that are so?—I am not sure that I quite understand the meaning of the words "so far as being Protestant goes."

221. But what is it that you exactly mean by the Church of England being in communion with the church in America?—I mean that the Episcopal Church in America and the Church of England are in communion with each other. But I take it that Calvinistic sects, or other Protestant sects, are not in communion with the Church of England, but they would be included under the denomination of Protestant.

222. And the sisters would object to act with any Protestant institution that did not connect itself with the Church of England?—They would object to any institution that did not connect itself with the Church of England.

223. Not merely must it be episcopal, but it must be connected with the Church of England?—It must be in communion with the Church of England.

224. Has this institution any connections in Scotland?—No.

225. Mr. Newdegate.] I believe the Lady Superior is Mrs. Monsell?—Yes; the Honourable Mrs. Monsell.

226. Who is the assistant warden?—The subwarden is the Rev. William Henry Hutchings.

227. You say that the sisters have some property of their own?—Yes; some of them have.

228. And you will put in a copy of the rules?—I will obtain a copy of the statutes; that is what I offered to put in, and not a copy of the rules of the institution; I have no doubt that there would be no objection to put in a copy of the rules; but I will inquire.

229. Are you aware that there is an establishment in Margaret-street, Cavendish-square?—It is called All Saints' Home.

230. Is that in connectien with Clewer?—No; it is a separate institution.

231. I suppose that these rules are virtually the constitution of the society; they contain the constitution of the society?—The rules of the sisterhood are, and the statutes of the House of Mercy are, the rules of that society.

232. But the rules form the constitution of the society?—Yes.

233. Are you aware whether there is any declaration made to observe these rules?—Yes; there is a promise made in the chapel.

234. And is that of the same nature as this: "We the undersigned do hereby severally agree to be bound by and observe all and every the statutes and rules of the society of the sisters established by the foregoing deed, so far as the same are applicable to us respectively, God being our helper"?—Yes; I think I have a copy of the rules relating to the community fund which I can give the Committee now; that is simply in relation to the property of the sisters.

235. What I wish to know is, what is the declaration of adhesion to contract; is it by declaration or by signature?—Both.

236. I have read a declaration to you; is it analogous to that?—It is something similar. I have not a copy of the rules here; but I know that each sister signs the regulations as to the community fund. The formal declaration by word of mouth is made in the chapel; the question is asked, "Will you observe the rules and regulations of this institution?" Then the answer is made vivâ voce. I am not certain whether there is any formal declaration attached to this document containing the rules of the community, but there may be; at any rate, the sisters sign it.

Mr. C. E. Freeman.

25 July 1870.

4237. You will ascertain that and let the Committee know?—Yes.

4238. Is there any branch in Wales?—No, I think not.

4239. Hitherto there have been two visitors, both bishops?—Yes.

4240. But you state, I think, that the rules have been altered since the present bishop undertook the task?—No; they were before the time that the late Bishop of Oxford was translated, and the new bishop undertook the office of visitor.

4241. Then in the change there was an alteration of the rules?—Yes, which the new bishop approved, as well as the late bishop.

4242. I think you said that this institution could not properly be termed Protestant?—No, I did not state that. I intended to find fault with the term as applied to the Church of England.

4243. Then, according to your understanding in the evidence that you have given, the Church of England is not Protestant?—Certainly that is my understanding generally. When I say that I do not consider that it is Protestant, I am not sure that I quite understand what Protestant means. If Protestant means protesting against the doctrines of the Church of Rome, then, I suppose, that there are some doctrines of the Church of Rome which the Church of England protests against, and to such an extent it may be Protestant.

4244. Chairman.] Are those the views of the sisterhood?—I do not know. I have never compared my views with those of the sisterhood. But there is not a word in the Prayer-book to show that the Church of England is Protestant.

4245. Mr. T. Chambers.] I understand you to say that there are no vows taken in this community?—No vows are taken.

4246. But you mentioned a promise made in the chapel?—Yes.

4247. Is that promise made in connection with a religious service?—Yes.

4248. On the entry of a sister into the sisterhood?—Yes.

4249. You said that you would furnish us with the terms of that promise?—Yes. In answer to questions of the sister as to her keeping the rule of the sisterhood, &c., the answers are, "I will do so, God being my helper," or to that effect. Some sisters do not sign the rules of the sisterhood, only the regulations as to the community fund.

4250. You draw a distinction between a promise made in the course of a religious service in the chapel on entering the sisterhood, and what you understand by a vow?—When I say that there are no vows, I should probably say that there are no life vows; that any sister is at liberty to leave the institution at any time.

4251. I understood you to express a doubt in answer to the Chairman, on the point whether a sister could leave the institution?—I think I did not express any doubt.

4252. The substance of your answer, as I took it down, was, "I do not know whether the siste could withdraw"?—That is as to money.

4253. Then there would be no difficulty in sister leaving the institution at any time?—N it is one of the fundamental statutes.

4254. And therefore she promises to obser the regulations so long as she continues a memb of the society?—Yes, but the promise is not qualified.

4255. That is distinctly understood?—That one of the statutes of the institution.

4256. Have you known any instance?—No.

4257. Mr. Newdegate.] Was there ever an e tablishment at Bristol or Clifton?—No, I thi not; not in connection with this institution.

4258. Chairman.] Have you had any questi with respect to the nature of bequests or gi made to this institution as to whether they a to be considered as charities?—No.

4259. Would a bequest to the institution f any object that the institution has in view, considered charity?—Primarily not, I shou think; because the first object to which the co munity fund is applicable, is the maintenance the sisters, that being provided for for objects benevolence and mercy, connected with t Church of England, in the discretion of t council.

4260. Would a gift for the maintenance the sisterhood be considered a charitable use?— think not.

4261. You would not consider that within t jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners, wou you?—I have never considered so.

4262. Mr. Sherlock.] Is not the entire life these ladies devoted to works of charity a mercy?—Entirely.

4263. They visit the sick?—Yes.

4264. They teach the ignorant?—Yes.

4265. And they instruct in religion?—Yes.

4266. They devote their lives to these object —Entirely.

4267. Is not the institution, and the suppo of the institution, supporting works of charity? Entirely.

4268. Now, is it your opinion, as a lawyer, th if there were a bequest to this institution, t executor could not hold it, and put the mon into his own pocket?—Certainly not.

4269. The sisterhood consisting of ladies w devote their lives to these particular works charity, is it your opinion that the executor w by the terms of a will was bound to pay over this institution, thus formed, a sum of mon could put the money into his own pocket?—N 4270. Would not the Court of Chancery int fere?—Yes, unquestionably.

4271. And the question of trustees would b mere mechanical mode of carrying out the inte tion?—Yes.

4272. Therefore, practically, there is no dang of any funds being misappropriated?—No whatever.

4273. Chairman.] You have no communicati which you wish to make to this Committee on t subject of this institution?—No, I think no nothing occurs to me at present.

4274. Mr. Newdegate.] Will you send t rules of the sisterhood?—Supposing the super does not object to it, I will send them with statutes. I have no doubt whatever that th will not be the slightest objection to send both.

Mr. EDWIN FOSTER, called in; and Examined.

4275. Mr. Newdegate.] I THINK you are engaged in the building trade, and live at Abergavenny?—Yes.

4276. And I understand that you are at present engaged in erecting a monastery at Chapel-y-fin, about 14 miles from Abergavenny, for the Rev. Mr. Lyne?—Yes.

4277. You say that this is a monastery; can you produce the plans which will show that it is a monastery?—It is called a monastery by the architect (producing the plans).

4278. I think that this part (pointing to the plan), which is at present incomplete, will eventually be a part of the cloisters, will it not?—Yes.

4279. And that is a complete plan, as it is hereafter to be carried out?—Yes.

4280. Chairman.] I understand that you have a contract with certain parties for building a monastery, and this is the plan of such an institution?—Yes.

4281. Mr. Newdegate.] You have been in correspondence with the Rev. Mr. Lyne?—Yes.

4282. And he does not sign by his own name, but he signs himself "Ignatius, O. S. B.," does he not?—Yes.

4283. What do you understand by O. S. B.?—Order of St. Benedict, I understand it to mean.

4284. Were you present when the foundation was laid?—Yes.

4285. Was there any ceremony?—Yes, there was.

4286. The Rev. Mr. Husbands was present, was he not?—Yes, the Rev. Mr. Husbands was present, and two other monks, besides the Rev. Mr. Lyne.

4287. And they used ceremonies and incense?—Yes.

4288. Do you know to whom the property upon which this building is erected now belongs?—I do not; I supposed at the time that I was engaged to build the abbey, that it belonged to the Reverend Joseph Leycester Lyne; he had bought it of Mr. Dod.

4289. Mr. Dod has still some property adjoining?—Yes.

4290. And sold this for the purpose?—For the the purpose of building this monastery.

4291. But you do not know to whom?—No, I do not know; I have since been told that it was in the name of some lady.

4292. You have received a considerable sum, and there is some money still due to you?—Yes.

4293. But you have not given up possession of the building?—No, not given up possession; we have not finished that portion yet.

4294. Chairman.] Do we rightly understand that you have made a contract with the Reverend Mr. Lyne for the purpose of building a monastery?—That portion of the monastery.

4295. Was there a building there already?—No building at all.

4296. Then somebody else was to complete it?—No, we do not know who will finish it.

4297. Were you engaged to erect a portion of a building?—Yes.

4298. And somebody else, or you yourself, were at some time to complete the rest?—Yes, so I understood, if the funds came in.

4299. If the funds came in it would be finished?—Yes.

4300. That has not been the case, I believe?—That has not been the case as yet; at least I do not know how that matter is.

4301. Did you devise the plan for the monastery, or did you receive it from the Reverend Mr. Lyne?—I received it from the Reverend Mr. Lyne; the plans were made by a Mr. Buckridge.

4302. After some model now existing in this country?—Yes, the ancient abbey of Lanthony.

4303. Is that near to this site?—About four miles from it, and ten miles from Abergavenny.

4304. Is it an institution now existing?—No, it is a ruin.

4305. You were to build this after that model, and this was your plan which you submitted upon those instructions?—No, the architect gave me this plan; Mr. Lyne furnished me with the plan; the plans were furnished by an architect; I am a builder.

4306. You gave a description of the ceremony at the foundation of this place; were you present?—I was present.

4307. What sort of ceremony was it?—There was incense burnt, and a lighted candle in a lantern, and a cross carried before it.

4308. What time of the day was that?—About three o'clock; I forget exactly the hour, but somewhere near to that.

4309. What were the candles for?—I do not know; it was emblematic, I suppose.

4310. Were there great numbers that attended?—No, not a great many in attendance, only a few besides the workmen.

4311. Was much notice given of it before the ceremony began?—No, it was not generally known; and that is the reason, I think, that there were not very many people there.

4312. Was the Rev. Mr. Lyne there himself?—Yes.

4313. Had he any particular dress on?—Yes, his cowl and a kind of cassock.

4314. There were two other persons whom you named that you called monks, were they dressed in the same way?—Yes.

4315. Is that the only reason why you call them monks?—They are called monks. The Rev. Joseph Leycester Lyne called them monks, and that is the reason that I call them monks. One is called Father Philip, and the other Brother Serene.

4316. Are we to understand that they call themselves monks?—Yes.

4317. Are they clergymen?—I do not know what the monks are.

4318. Was there any service performed upon this occasion?—There were merely some prayers read, and something like hymns chanted.

4319. Now, as far as we understand you, you have begun your contract; you have commenced the building, but you have not completed what you undertook to do?—No.

4320. I do not think that you stated the why you had not?—We are going on with it now; it is being done as fast as we can get it done.

4321. Then there is no want of means?—No, not that I am aware of. That is not the reason why it is not being carried out. It is being carried out as fast as we can do it.

Mr. E. Foster.

25 July 1870.

4322. Then there is no difficulty about it?—Not that I am aware of.

4323. There has been no question who is to pay ultimately if the thing is not carried out?—No. Of course I understand that the Rev. Joseph Leycester Lyne will pay me.

4324. Mr. Sherlock.] You are merely contractor for the building?—Yes, that is all.

4325. What is the amount of the contract?—£. 674.

4326. For the whole building?—No, for a portion, merely one side of the quadrangle.

4327. You are only contractor for a portion?—Yes.

4328. Then, of course, you know nothing except from those plans as to who are to inhabit this building?—No; I do not know anything of that.

4329. Are you prepared to say that no part of it is to be a hospital?—I cannot say.

4330. There is a large portion there set aside for a burial ground?—I understand that the monks, when they die, will be buried there.

4331. Who told you that?—It was a remark made by the Rev. Mr. Lyne. That space of 60 feet square is intended for a burial-ground for the monks when they die.

4332. But, of course, no person inhabits it at present; it is incomplete?—It is incomplete.

4333. When did the works commence?—Last February.

4334. When did this sermon that you were present at take place?—It was not a sermon; it was merely an address; it was last February, at the laying of the foundation stone; and the Rev. Mr. Lyne gave an address.

4335. To you and to the two monks who were there?—And to the workmen.

4336. How many workmen were there?—About 20 there.

4337. They had done nothing at that time?—Yes, they had dug out the foundations and prepared a quantity of stone for the work.

4338. The address was delivered to that assembly of two monks, yourself, and the 20 workmen?—And perhaps 20 strangers round.

4339. Chairman.] Was there any reporter present?—No.

4340. It did not appear in the papers afterwards?—Yes, it did; some one present, I suppose, reported it; it did get into the papers; several papers contained very lengthy reports of it.

4341. Mr. O'Reilly.] Do you know of your own knowledge whether any of these persons are monks or not?—No; I have no knowledge as to that, excepting their own statements.

4342. Do you know whether any of them have taken any vows or not?—I do not know further than what I have heard in the way of rumour; I know nothing more.

4343. Do you know whether any of them are clergymen or not?—I could not say, except as to Mr. Lyne. I am not sure.

4344. In regard to Mr. Lyne, what should you understand by the word clergyman?—I understand that he is a clergyman of the Church of England.

4345. Do you mean a priest of the Church of England?—Yes.

4346. Do you know that?—I do not know, but I have always understood so.

4347. Mr. Newdegate.] Mr. Husbands was present, was he not?—Yes.

4348. And officiated as priest, did he not?—Yes; with a white gown on, ornamented.

Mr. Francis Lyne, called in; and Examined.

Mr. F. Lyne.

4349. Mr. Newdegate.] I think your son is very zealous in the desire to found monasteries, is he not?—Yes.

4350. And he founded one, to your knowledge, in Norwich, did he not?—He made a vain attempt to do so. No person could call it a monastery; it would be nonsense to do so.

4351. How far did those proceedings go; what was the nature of them?—They went to this extent, that he bought a house there, and had certain young men in it under his control, and he gave it the name of a monastery, and he called these gentlemen monks. But those who understand it much better than himself have pronounced it to be altogether a mistake. I could relieve the Committee very much, I think, if I state that there is a gentleman on your Committee who understands the case perfectly. There is also the Member for Norwich, who has worked up this case for me, and understands it perfectly.

4352. Was it Mr. Jessel's opinion that this property was vested in your son, or in whom did he consider it to be vested?—When Mr. Jessel gave his opinion, it was to the effect that it was not vested in my son; subsequently Mr. Tillett proved the reverse.

4353. Then is not your son in possession of this property now?—It is in Chancery now; he claims it.

4354. Has any decision been given upon it?—No, not yet.

4355. The contest is between your son and some persons who now claim the property?—Yes. It is claimed by the Rev. George Drury for himself and his heirs.

4356. To what purpose is this house now devoted?—It has been let for a cheese warehouse, and then it was also let to a lady to preach in.

4357. And the fact is that your son has lost possession?—He has lost possession.

4358. But whilst it was in his possession he called it a monastery, and built a chapel on it?—At his own cost.

4359. And had a certain number of persons there that he called monks?—Yes.

4360. It appears from the evidence of the last witness, that he does not sign his own name, but signs the name Ignatius, with the letters O.S.B.?—Yes.

4361. Does that, according to your apprehension, mean that he is of the Benedictine order?—That is what he himself means, certainly.

4362. But still he considers himself connected with the Church of England?—Yes, and to myself always signs his proper name, because he knows that I prefer it.

4363. Generally, your evidence would go to this, that your son has a strong desire to found what he calls a monastery, that he has lost his property at Norwich, and that you were not aware that he had commenced another building?—No, I was aware of it, though I take no part in it whatever; I could not help knowing it.

4364. The idea seems to be peculiar to your son, h, that he can found some kind of brotherhood monastic institution in connection with the urch of England?—He has that fancy.

4365. Has he any sanction from any of the shops for that?—No.

4366. Never has had?—Never. I ought to ention that they are extremely friendly and nd to him, and appreciate his zeal very highly; d some of the bishops have allowed him to each in their dioceses, on the condition that nen he does preach, he preaches in a surice, the usual dress. The great objection with e bishops has been his dress.

4367. And I think that your son was ordained the diocese of Exeter, was he not?—Yes.

4368. Having commenced his career under ishop Eden, in Scotland?—Yes.

4369. Is it long that he has been making these tempts to found a monastic order?—Yes, for e last seven or eight years, I think.

4370. Has he induced many persons to join m as monks or brothers?—He has; I call it a arful support.

4371. He has the support of others?—Yes, ry largely.

4372. Are you aware whether these persons ntribute in any way to the undertakings in hich he is engaged?—Yes, they do from time time, largely.

4373. Then I suppose that, in the suit which before Chancery, your son is the representave of others?—No; it is entirely his own proerty. The chapel alone cost him, of his own oney, 1,300 l. All the debts I have paid ounting to upwards of 1,200 l. And he has id again and again from his pupils that he will ot receive money except on the condition and on he principle that "he is to do what he will with is own."

4374. Then you are not aware that any of those ho have joined the community as monks have ontributed anything?—If I were to say that it ould be only a guess. I have no knowledge.

4375. Are you aware at all of the kind of ngagement that your son has taken towards those ho join him, and of the engagement that they ave made to him?—No. I always set my face gainst it. I do not enter into the subject at all. He is a most admirable son in every possible espect, and I ought, as a father, to be proud of im; but in this one particular we are silent.

4376. Chairman.] Do you know whether he as ever taken any legal opinion as to whether he an realise his intention of establishing a monasery in this country?—No; I do not think that e ever has. I do not know but what I may ave heard it said that he could not do it accordng to the present law. I think I have heard thers say so, not himself; but that is merely omething passing through my mind that some ime ago I heard it said it was altogether illegal.

4377. That if he could establish a monastery it ould be illegal?—I think so, certainly.

4378. You say that the bishop's chief objection o his proceedings was the dress he used to wear?—I think so.

4379. And the dress of those associated with im?—It would apply to all, of course. I have ad communication with the late Archbishop of Canterbury about it.

4380. But the bishops did not take any objecion to his building a monastery, or to his proceedings?—They did not make any formal bjection; they could not interfere.

4381. And his doctrines, I believe, were peculiar in certain respects?—They are.

4382. The bishops did not object to those doctrines?—That is more than I can say, in saying that they have been very friendly to him, I only speak of their personal regard and admiration for his zeal. Whether that is a mistaken zeal or not is another question.

4383. He had a cure, had he not, in Norwich?—No.

4384. He was a parish priest there?—He is only a deacon; he has not got priest's orders.

4385. But he used to administer in one of the parish churches in Norwich, or the neighbourhood, did he not?—Not to my knowledge; he acted as a kind of curate for the Rev. Geo. Drury, of Claydon, in the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Norwich, but without a license.

4386. I believe that he had some correspondence with the Bishop of Norwich a few years ago?—Yes, certainly.

4387. Do you remember what was the nature of that correspondence, and what was the object of it?—I think that the bishop inhibited him, and he prevented his preaching in his churches; indeed I know he did, because I remember now that that took place.

4388. Was that owing to his doctrines, or owing to his dress?—Both, I should fancy.

4389. Has he quite left Norwich now?—Quite.

4390. But he has been preaching in London, I think?—He has.

4391. In one of the parish churches in the City?—Exactly.

4392. It was not objected to by any of the bishops?—It was objected to by Dr. Tait, under a mistake, through some particular circumstances not alluding either to doctrine or dress, and Dr. Tait prevented his preaching there; and since then Dr. Tait has allowed him to preach at the desire of General Brownrigge, at Folkestone. The general wished him to preach to the troops, at the Shorncliffe camp, and wrote to Dr. Tait, now Archbishop of Canterbury, and the archbishop said that he might do it in a surplice; and my son did preach, with the archbishop's sanction, not to the troops, but at Hythe, in the church of the Rev. Mr. Sangar, the vicar, who also asked for, and obtained, the archbishop's special permission before my son did preach; and in the church of Mr. Sangar many of the soldiers went to hear my son.

4393. In all essential circumstances you consider him still a member of the Church of England?—Certainly, and that is his boast.

4394. And that hitherto he has been willing to employ his means in erecting monastic institutions, and has failed?—In my opinion, whether he considers what he has done a success, is a matter for himself. I consider it a failure.

4395. You find that he does not act alone; he is encouraged by others, is favoured by the bishops, and has received contributions from various persons?—I do not say that he is favoured by the bishops, only as far as I have told you, namely, that on General Brownrigge applying to the Archbishop of Canterbury for permission to let my son preach to the troops at the camp, the Archbishop gave permission, provided he preached in a surplice. In a neighbouring church my son did preach, but the Duke of Cambridge would not allow him to preach at the camp.

4396. But did any ecclesiastical or civil authority

Mr. F. Lyne.

rity interfere to prevent his having a monastery?—No, there was no interference in any way.

4397. So that if he had been able to maintain it, or had been more fortunate in those with whom he was associated, he might have received property, and there might have been an important institution founded in the city of Norwich?—Very likely.

4398. And I think you say he is still with others persevering in this endeavour to establish monastic institutions in this country?—Yes, he is, and his congregations are perfectly wonderful; I am told that at Brighton 2,000 people form his congregations.

4399. And his contributions are in some proportion?—They are.

4400. You do not know that there is any sum invested for the purpose of establishing these institutions?—No, I do not.

4401. I suppose whatever is contributed, he applies as he thinks best?—Exactly so; he says from the pulpit that he will give no account of it, but he will apply it as he chooses, and they are to give under those conditions.

4402. Did you hear the evidence of a builder here just now?—I did.

4403. That of which he spoke is the last attempt that your son has made to erect monastic institutions?—Yes, as far as I know.

4404. Mr. O'Reilly.] Is your son a deacon or a priest of the Church of England?—A deacon.

4405. Mr. Sherlock.] In regard to this suit in Chancery, which you have adverted to, is that to determine the right to the property in question?—Yes; my son claims it, as I tell you, under Mr. Tillett's opinion. He bought it; he built a chapel there, and paid for the chapel, and to his amazament he finds the title-deeds are in another person's name, and that person claiming to be the absolute owner. And this man says now, to satisfy the Court of Chancery, "I took it as a secret private trust for the order." I know all about it; but as I cannot go into particulars here, the less I say of them the better.

4406. As I understand you, the question is still undetermined?—Yes.

4407. And if your son succeeds, he means to devote this building for the purpose of what he considers a monastery?—No; he would sell it, in my opinion, and with my advice.

4408. You have no doubt, however you may have differed from him, as to the excellent intention he has?—It is superior to a degree; I am only sorry that it has taken that direction.

4409. The archbishop seems to have thought him orthodox in allowing him to preach?—I cannot say what he thought; the late archbishop, Dr. Longley, showed a fatherly feeling for him, and would have put a restraint on him if he could; but the bishops have tolerated him, I may say, to an amazing degree.

4410. But the archbishop permitted him to preach, provided he preached in a surplice?—Yes.

4411. Leaving him to select his own views?—Yes.

4412. But the Duke of Cambridge objected?—It was because the Chaplain General of the Forces made an objection.

WESTTHORN.

(Part. Reg. Seis. Renfrew, Lib. 1561, Fo. 50.)

At Glasgow, the 28th day of February 1860, this disposition, with warrant of registration thereon, presented by Matthew Rae, writer, in Glasgow, between the hours of four and five, afternoon, is recorded as follows :—

I, James Farie, Esq., of Farme, heritable proprietor of the lands and others after disponed, considering that by minute of agreement and sale dated the 4th and 10th days of May 1859, entered into between me on the one part, and the Reverend Anselm Robertson, Roman Catholic Clergyman, then residing in Glasgow, now at Westthorn, on the other part, I, in consideration of the price thereby stipulated and hereinafter specified, agreed and bound myself, upon receiving payment of the said price, to grant, execute, and deliver a valid disposition to the said Reverend Anselm Robertson, and such other person or persons as he might name, either as trustees or otherwise, and according to such destination as he might prescribe, of all and whole the stripe or piece of ground and others hereinafter disponed; and on the other part the said Reverend Anselm Robertson agreed and bound himself, at the term of Whitsunday 1859, and upon receiving delivery of the said disposition, to make payment to me of the sum of 2,200 l. sterling as the stipulated price of the said lands and others, with interest and penalty as therein mentioned, as the said minute of agreement and sale in itself more fully bears. And now, seeing that the said Reverend Anselm Robertson has, in terms of the said agreement, made payment to me of the foresaid sum of 2,200 l. sterling, whereof I hereby acknowledge the receipt, and discharge him and his heirs and successors for ever, and has requested me to grant these presents in the terms underwritten. Therefore I have sold and disponed, as I do hereby, at the request and with consent of the said Reverend Anselm Robertson, for all right or interest he has in the premises, sell, alienate, and dispone to, and in favour of, the Right Reverend Doctor John Murdoch, Roman Catholic Bishop, residing in Glasgow, vicar apostolic in the western district of Scotland, the Right Reverend Doctor Alexander Smith, Roman Catholic Bishop, in Glasgow, the Reverend John Gray, the Reverend John Macintosh, the Reverend Donald Carmichael, the Reverend Donald McEachern, the Reverend Eugene Small, and the Reverend Roderick Chisholm, all Roman Catholic clergymen, in Glasgow, the Reverend James Cameron, Roman Catholic clergyman in Maryhill, and the said Reverend Anselm Robertson, and to any other person or persons to be appointed to act along with, or to succeed, them in manner after mentioned, and to the survivors and survivor of them, in trust for the promotion of education in Scotland in connection with the Roman Catholic Church, declaring that a majority of the said trustees above named, and to be appointed as aforesaid, acting and resident in Scotland, shall at all times form a quorum, and that the said trust shall continue and be permanently maintained upon the appointment of new trustees by the said Right Reverend Doctor John Murdoch, or by the Roman Catholic Bishop or vicar apostolic officiating for the time in the western district of Scotland, by a writing under his hand from time to time, when and as often such appointment may become necessary, and to the assignees of the said trustees or their successors as aforesaid, heritably and irredeemably, all and whole that stripe or piece of ground, part of the lands of Westthorn, containing three acres one rood and three poles, or thereby, imperial standard measure, bounded on the west, west north west, west by north, north west by west, and south west by south, by other parts of the lands of Westthorn belonging to me, along which it extends in the first place on the west 328 feet or thereby along the west side of the present burn, measuring northward from its junction with the river Clyde in the second place, on the west north west 471 feet or thereby, on a straight line drawn from the termination of the last described boundary to a point ranging with the south face of the southmost wall of Westthorn Mill, and 22 feet distant from the south-west corner of the said mill, and in the third place on the west by north, north west by west, and south west by south, partly by a line parallel to and 22 feet distant distant from the west wall of said mill, and partly by the centre and line of a thorn hedge forming the side of the road leading to the said mill, and which road is situated within the ground hereby disponed on the north west by the private road leading from Westthorn farm steading to the New London-road, along which it extends 25 feet, or thereby, on the north west by north by part of the lands of Dalbeth along which, measuring from the said private road to the centre of the mill lead, it extends 394 feet, or thereby, on the north east by north side of the said road leading to the foresaid mill, and situated within the ground hereby disponed, on the south east by east from the termination of the last described boundary to the line of the thorn hedge next after mentioned, by the centre of the mill lead separating the lands of Dalbeth from the lands of Westthorn, on the north north east by the centre of the thorn hedge which runs in a straight line between said mill lead and the burn, along which, measuring from the centre of the mill lead to the centre of the burn, it extends 77 feet, or thereby, and from thence to the junction of the said burn with the river Clyde, the said ground and subjects hereby disponed are bounded by the centre of said burn separating the lands of Dalbeth from the lands of Westthorn, all as delineated on a plan thereof made out by William Kyle, land surveyor, in Glasgow, and signed by me and the said Reverend Anselm Robertson as relative to the said minute of agreement and sale, together with the said mill and whole other buildings and erections on the said piece of ground and entry to the same by the foresaid private road leading from the new London-road to Westthorn farm steading and whole other parts, pendicles and pertinents thereof, so far as the same are my property, and together also with right, so far as belonging to me, to the mill dam and mill lead within the lands of Dalbeth, my said disponees and their foresaid freeing and relieving me and my foresaids in all time coming of the expense of upholding the said mill dam and lead, and of all charges therewith connected, which stripe or piece of ground before disponed, is part and portion of all and whole those parts and portions of the lands and estate of Westthorn belonging to me, lying in the Barony parish of Glasgow and shire of Lanark, which were formerly parts and portions of the lands of Dalbeth known by the name of the Upper and Lower Haugh, and extending to about 16 acres or thereby, bounded by the river Clyde on the east, south, and southwest, on the west by a paling and hedge running from the Clyde to the march hedge on the north and west, and again by the said march hedge on the north, and the hedge planted between the properties of Westthorn and Dalbeth, and again by the said new hedge until it joins the conduit leading from the Millburn to Clyde, and on the east by the said conduit, and which said subjects last above described were acquired by James Sword, junior, formerly of Westthorn, from James Hopkirk, esquire, of Dalbeth, by feu disposition dated the 19th day of March 1819, reserving always to me and my heirs and successors, the whole coal, metals, and minerals in the said piece of ground hereby disponed, with full power by ourselves, our tenants and servants, so far as, but no farther than, we at present have power so to do, to search for, work, and win the said coal, metals, and minerals, and also to form all necessary mines or roadways underneath the said road and the said burn, so as to connect the mineral field under the ground before disponed, with the mineral field in the lands adjoining, but that always in such a manner as not to make pits or break the surface of the said ground in searching for, working, or winning the said coal, metals, and minerals, and without our being liable for any damage which the surface of the ground or the buildings and erections thereon may sustain by the working of the said coal, metals, and minerals in the manner hereby prescribed, declaring always, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that I and my foresaids shall not be at liberty to search for or work and win said coal, metals, or minerals, within a space forming a circuit of 20 yards around the foresaid mill, measuring from the outer walls thereof, reserving also to me and my foresaids power and liberty to form, so far as not already done, such drains or sewers through the said piece of ground as may be necessary for the purpose of carrying off and discharging into the said burn, or the channel thereof, or mill lead, waste, or surplus water from my other lands of Westthorn, and to repair the said drains or sewers from time to time when necessary, but so as not to cause unnecessary damage to my said disponees or their assignees, and declaring that such drains or sewers as may hereafter be formed as aforesaid, shall not be formed within a distance of 20 yards from the said mill on any side, and also declaring that my said disponees and their foresaids shall, notwithstanding the above reservation, have full power and liberty to divert the course of the said burn and mill lead as they may think proper, and also to cover or close up the present channels thereof; but in case they shall cover or close up the present channels of the said burn or mill lead so as to prevent them from carrying off the said waste or surplus water, I and my foresaids shall, in that event, have power either to connect said drains or sewers with the new course of the said burn or mill lead, or to carry them down to the river Clyde, together with all right, title, and interest, claim of right, property, and possession which I, my predecessors and authors, or heirs and successors, have had or can in any way claim or pretend to the said lands and others before disponed in all time coming, declaring without prejudice to their rights and powers generally as trustees foresaid, that my said disponees and their foresaids shall have full power to sell and dispose of the said lands and others at pleasure, and also to borrow money on the security thereof, and to grant all dispositions, bonds, and dispositions in security, and other writings necessary; and that the purchasers or lenders shall have no concern with, or right to inquire into the application of, the price or prices, or of the sums borrowed, or the purposes of the trust, with entry as at the term of Whitsunday last 1859, to be holden a me vel de me; and I resign the said lands and others for new infeftment, but always with and under the reservations, conditions, and declarations before specified; and I

COPY of the STATUTES of the House of the Sisters of the Poor, Margaret-street, Cavendish-square. Appendix, No. 4.

"Nihil habentes omnia possidentes."

IN the name of the Holy and Undivided Trinity.

The following Statutes have been agreed upon and adopted for the due order and government of the house of THE SISTERS OF THE POOR, which has been established for the purposes hereinafter set forth, and these Statutes have been adopted with the desire and intent that through the blessing of God the principles of which the said house has been founded may be always preserved unchanged and inviolate, and that it may ever be conducted and carried on in accordance with the true Christian faith as it is set forth in the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England to the Glory of Almighty God and the eternal salvation of souls for whom Christ died; therefore these presents witness, and it is hereby agreed and declared as follows (that is to say):

1. The object of the said society, called "The Sisters of the Poor," is the reception and maintenance of incurables of aged and infirm persons in destitute circumstances, and orphans. The visiting and nursing of the poor and sick, and the relief of their spiritual and temporal wants, the burial of the dead and the exercise of other works of mercy; and the said society shall consist of a superior and sisters, and shall be assisted by trustees, an auditor, and a chaplain, and such other officers as the superior and sisters shall hereafter think fit to appoint.

2. The superior and sisters shall elect such person as they shall think fit to be their visitor, and the person so elected by the superior and sisters as aforesaid shall be the visitor for the time being; and such visitor shall have full power and authority, as well upon his own mere motion as upon appeal lodged, or complaint made, at all times to visit the house, and every member, inmate, and officer of the same, and to do and order all things necessary to enforce obedience to the rules and Statutes for the time being binding on the members of the said society, and to enforce therein in all respects the order and discipline of the Church of England, and also to repress and punish all things contrary to the same rules, order, and discipline, and also generally to do and order all those things which appertain by law to the office of visitor, or which shall be hereinafter specially appointed; and the First Visitor of the said institution shall be the Right Honourable and Right Reverend Father in God Archibald Campbell, Lord Bishop of London.

3. The superior shall be a fully admitted sister, and shall be appointed in manner hereinafter mentioned, and shall have the government of the sisters and other inmates of the said house, and of the household thereof.

The first chaplain of the said house shall be the Rev. William Upton Richards, the incumbent of the said district of All Saints; and all future chaplains of the said House shall be elected by the said superior and sisters, and shall be allowed and confirmed by the visitor.

The auditor shall audit and pass all the accounts of the society. The first auditor shall be Benjamin Lancaster, Esq., and all future auditors shall be elected by the superior and sisters.

Appendix, No. 4.

4. Harriet Brownlow Byron being the foundress of the said society, and having been elected by the said sisters to be their first superior, she shall retain the office of superior during the term of her natural life, and every succeeding superior shall hold her office during the term of three years from the date of her election.

5. On every vacancy in the office of superior the fully admitted sisters shall by a majority of votes, nominate one of their own number as successor, and in case they shall fail to nominate a successor within one calendar month from the date of the vacancy, then the appointment shall lapse to the visitor, who shall appoint one of the sisters to be such superior.

6. Every superior hereafter to be elected shall continue in office for the period of three years, but may at the end of that period be continued in her office by the visitor, or be re-elected by the sisters for another period of three years, and so on from time to time, at the expiration of every period of three years.

7. The superior or any sister may be removed from her office or from the society by the visitor on complaint of the chaplain, or the superior, or of the sisters, as the case may be, but the sisters shall not lay any complaint touching the superior or a sister before the visitor, until it shall have been assented to by a majority of them, and shall have been signified in writing to the superior, or the sister complained against, for fourteen days before the same shall be laid before the visitor.

8. The superior may from time to time appoint any fully admitted sister to be her assistant in the office of superior for such period as she shall think proper; and during any vacancy in the office of superior, or during the absence or incapacity of the superior by reason of illness, such assistant shall perform the duties of that office; and if on any such vacancy, absence, or incapacity, there shall be no assistant, the senior sister in order of admission shall act as superior for the time being.

9. The assistant may be removed by the superior at any time, at her will and pleasure.

10. The sisters shall consist of two classes:—

1st. Confirmed sisters after probation, and—

2nd. Sisters probationers: the term and nature of probation shall be settled in the rules hereinafter mentioned, but the superior and sisters, with the advice of the chaplain, shall be at liberty to shorten the period of probation at their discretion in any particular case.

11. No person shall be admitted into the house as sister probationer unless she be a member of the Church of England, and in full communion with the same. And every such admission shall be made in such manner and form as shall be determined and set forth in the said rules.

12. Every sister shall have full and uncontrolled liberty whenever she shall think fit to leave the house and society.

13. Every sister shall upon admittance to probation agree to be bound by, and observe, all the Statutes and rules of the society applicable to herself; and such probationers shall not in any manner interfere or prefer complaints to the chaplain or to the visitor respecting the conduct of the house or of the members thereof.

14. The superior may, with the consent of the majority of the sisters and of the chaplain, make and vary such rules for the internal management and discipline of the sisters as shall be consistent with the Statutes of the society, and be approved of by the visitor; and such rules shall be accessible to all members of the society.

15. The superior shall have full power at any time, with the consent of the visitor and chaplain, to remove or expel any sister from the society.

16. The receipts and expenditure of the society shall be under the entire control and management of the superior for the time being, who shall act as treasurer, and the superior shall pass her accounts from time to time before the auditor.

17. All the real estates and chattels, real houses, leasehold or copyhold estates, and all monies invested in the public stocks or funds, and all household furniture, books, linen, china, and other chattels, personal and effects respectively belonging to the society, shall be respectively conveyed and assigned unto, and invested in, the names of the trustees for the

the time being of the society, and be held by them upon trust for the benefit thereof; and such trustees shall from time to time dispose of such real estates and chattels real, either by way of absolute sale, or by demising or leasing such real estates and chattels real, houses, leasehold or copyhold estates, or any of them, and also of such stocks or funds, furniture, books, linen, china, and other chattels personal, and effects by sale, transfer, or other disposition thereof as the superior, with the consent of the majority of the sisters, shall from time to time direct; but in order to facilitate every sale which may be made, and every lease which may be granted of any such real estate or chattels real, houses, leasehold or copyhold estates, by the trustees thereof for the time being, such trusts and provisions shall be inserted in every conveyance and assignment which shall be made and be executed either on the original or any other conveyance or assignment of such real estates and chattels, real respectively as will effectually authorise and empower the trustees or trustee for the time being under such conveyance and assignment, to sell and demise the premises therein comprised, and to give effectual receipts to purchasers and others, without the necessity of any consent of, or direction by, any other person or persons whomsoever; and also a power in case of the death resignation, refusal, or incapacity of any trustee or trustees for the time being under such conveyance or assignment for the surviving or continuing or other trustees or trustee, or the executors or administrators of the last surviving trustee, to appoint a new trustee or trustees without the consent of any other person or persons whomsoever; and all such other powers and provisions whatsoever, as the counsel in the law of the said society shall advise as necessary for the purpose of relieving all purchasers, lessees, and others from the obligation of inquiring into the necessity or propriety of any sale or sales, or seeing to the application, or being answerable for the misapplication, of any purchase or other monies paid to or received by the trustees or trustee for the time being, under such conveyance or assignment; and the first trustees of the said society shall be Walter Carew Cocks, Philip Charles Hardwicke, Benjamin Lancaster, and John Edward Buller, Esquires.

18. No sister, whether dismissed or not, or whether remaining or not, or her heirs, executors, or administrators, shall have or be entitled, either in her lifetime or after her decease, to, or shall have power to claim, either at law or in equity, any estate, right, title, interest, property, or share whatsoever in or to the real estate or chattels real, houses, leasehold or copyhold estates, stocks, funds, and monies, or in or to the household furniture, books, linen, china, and other chattels personal, and effects belonging to or held in trust for or used for the purposes of the said society, or any of them, or any part or parts thereof, anything herein contained to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding.

19. Whenever any trustee or trustees shall die or desire to be discharged, or shall refuse or become incapable to act, the superior and sisters shall appoint a successor or successors, but this provision shall not supersede the power of appointing new trustees contained in such original conveyance or assignment of any of the real estates or chattels real, being the property of the society as aforesaid; and on every appointment of a new trustee or new trustees, all the property then vested in the trustees for the time being shall be so dealt with that the same may be effectually vested in such new trustee or trustees, and the surviving or continuing trustees, or if there shall be no surviving or continuing trustee, then in the new trustees only.

20. The trustees shall pay all rents, dividends, and other annual produce, and all other monies received from time to time by them, whether capital or annual income, into the hands of the bankers for the time being of the society to the account and credit of the said society, and such payment shall be a sufficient discharge to the trustees for the monies so paid by them, and the superior shall have the power to draw out monies from the bankers for the use of the society as may be required.

21. The trustees, visitors, and chaplain shall be members of the Church of England, and in full communion therewith.

22. If the want of funds or any other cause shall render it expedient to do so, the superior and sisters, or a majority of two-thirds of their whole number (including sisters and probationers), shall have power to dissolve the society, and in such case the houses and property of the said society in Margaret-street, Cavendish-square, shall be reconveyed to and vested in the said Harriet Brownlow Byron, her executors, administrators, and assigns, if the dissolution shall take place in her lifetime; but if the same shall take place after her decease, then the superior and sisters for the time being shall have power, on such dissolution, to order the sale and conversion of the whole of the property and effects thereof, both real and personal, into money; and the clear monies produced thereby, after paying all expenses attending such sale and conversion, and all debts owing from or on account of the society, shall be disposed of to such charitable purposes in connection with the Church of England, and in such manner, and, if thought fit, in such shares or proportions, as the trustees shall determine at a meeting specially called for that purpose, and which shall be held not less than three nor more than six calendar months after the sale shall have been completed.

Appendix, No. 4.

And if it shall appear to a majority of the members assembled at such meeting that the matter requires further investigation, their resolution shall forthwith be communicated to the visitor, who shall be requested to inquire into the matter with all convenient speed, and to communicate his judgment thereon in writing to the council.

XXXI. All the real estates and chattels real, and all moneys invested in the public stocks or funds, respectively belonging to the institution, shall be respectively conveyed and assigned unto and invested in the names of the trustees for the time being of the institution, except such estates and moneys as are mentioned in Rule XXXIII.; and such trustees shall from time to time dispose of such real estates and chattels real, either by way of absolute sale, or by demising or leasing such real estates and chattels real, or any of them, and also of such stocks or funds, by sale, transfer, or other disposition thereof, as the council shall from time to time direct; but in order to facilitate every sale which may be made, and every lease which may be granted, of any such real estates and chattels real, by the trustees thereof for the time being, such trusts and provisions shall be inserted in every conveyance and assignment which shall be made, and be executed either on the original or any other conveyance or assignment of such real estates and chattels real respectively, as will effectually authorise and empower the trustees or trustee for the time being, under such conveyance and assignment, to sell and demise the premises therein comprised, and to give effectual receipts to purchasers and others without the necessity of any consent of or direction by any other person or persons whomsoever; and also a power in case of the death, resignation, refusal, or incapacity of any trustee or trustees for the time being under such conveyance or assignment for the surviving, or continuing, or other trustees or trustee, or the executors or administrators of the last surviving trustee, to appoint a new trustee or new trustees without the consent of any other person or persons whomsoever, and all such other powers and provisions whatsoever, as the counsel in the law of the said institution shall advise as necessary for the purpose of relieving all purchasers, lessees, and others, from the obligation of inquiring into the necessity or propriety of any sale or sales, or seeing to the application, or being answerable for the misapplication, of any purchase or other moneys paid to or received by the trustees or trustee for the time being under such conveyance or assignment.

XXXII. Whenever any trustee or trustees shall die, or desire to be discharged, or shall refuse or become incapable to act, the council shall nominate and appoint a successor or successors. But this provision shall not supersede the power of appointing new trustees contained in such original conveyance or assignment of any of the real estates or chattels real, being the property of the institution as aforesaid; but the person or persons for the time being entitled to exercise the said power of appointment shall be requested to and shall exercise the same in accordance with the provisions of this statute, and appoint the person or persons so nominated by the council as aforesaid; and on every appointment of a new trustee or new trustees, all the property then vested in the trustees for the time being shall be so dealt with that the same may be effectually vested in such new trustee or or trustees, and the surviving or continuing trustees, or, if there shall be no surviving or continuing trustee, then in the new trustees only. The trustees shall pay all rents, dividends, and other annual produce, and all other moneys received from time to time by them, whether capital or annual income, into the hands of the bankers for the time being of the institution, to the account and credit of such institution; and such payment shall be a sufficient discharge to the trustees for the moneys so paid by them.

XXXIII. Real estates, chattels real, and personal property may be given, devised, or bequeathed to the warden, superior, and treasurers of the institution for the time being, as trustees of a fund to be called the "Community Fund." The capital and income of this fund shall be applied and disposed of by a council to be called the "Council of Finance of the community fund," which council of finance shall consist of the superior and assistant superior for the time being of the said institution, and five of the fully-admitted sisters of the first class, who shall be elected annually at a meeting (to be held at the Clewer House of Mercy for that purpose) of so many of the fully-admitted sisters of the first class as shall assemble at such meeting. Such capital and income of the community fund shall be applied and disposed of as follows; that is to say, in the first place, the council of finance shall apply the same for the maintenance and support of the sisters for the time being of the said institution, and subject thereto, for such objects of mercy and benevolence as the said council of finance of the community fund, with the concurrence always of the warden for the time being, shall think fit, except only that of every sum of 1,000 l. applied or disposed of for objects of mercy or benevolence, 30 l. at least shall be applied through the offertory of the parish church of Clewer, for such purposes of the Church of England, either in the United Kingdom or abroad, as the said council of finance of the community fund shall, in their uncontrolled discretion, think fit. Any regulation not inconsistent with these statutes relative to the time convening, and conduct of the general meeting hereinbefore referred to, or of any other meeting of sisters, and the mode of making the said elections, and the time convening and conduct of meetings of the said council of finance of the community fund, and the person or persons by whom moneys paid into the bankers to the credit of the said community fund may be drawn out, or relative to any one or more of such matters, or to any like matters, may from time to time be made, altered, or repealed by the superior and assistant superior for the time being, and the fully-admitted sisters of the first class, or such of them as shall assemble at any meeting which may be convened for that purpose; and such regulations relative to all or any of the matters aforesaid as have already been made by the said superior, assistant superior, and sisters of the first class, shall be considered as in force until altered or repealed as aforesaid. The warden, superior, and treasurers shall, from time to time, dispose of all real and personal property vested in them, either by way of absolute sale, or by devising or leasing such real estates and chattels real, or any of them; and also of such personal property by sale, transfer, or other disposition thereof, as the said council of finance of the community fund shall from time to time direct; but in order to facilitate every sale which may be made, and every lease which may be granted of any such real estates, or chattels real, by the warden, superior, or treasurers for the time being, such trusts and provisions shall be inserted in every conveyance and assignment which shall be made, and be executed, either in the original or any other conveyance or assignment of such real estates and chattels real respectively, as will effectually authorise and empower the warden, superior, and treasurers for the time being, under such conveyance and assignment, to sell and devise the premises therein comprised, and to give effectual receipts to purchasers and others, without the necessity of any consent of, or direction by, any other person or persons whomsoever; and also a power whenever a warden, superior, or treasurers for the time being shall die, resign, refuse, cease to hold, or become incapable of discharging the duties of his, her, or their office, for the surviving or continuing warden, superior, or treasurers for the time being, to appoint the successor in the office of the person or persons so dying, resigning, vacating, or becoming incapable as aforesaid, to be a new trustee or new trustees, without the consent of any other person or persons whomsoever, and all such other powers and provisions whatsoever, as the counsel in the law of the said institution shall advise as necessary for the purpose of releasing all purchasers, lessees, and others from the obligation of inquiring into the necessity or propriety of any sale or sales, or seeing to the application, or being answerable for the misapplication, of any purchase or other moneys paid to or received by the warden, superior, or treasurers for the time being, under such conveyance and assignment. Whenever a warden, superior, or treasurer shall die, cease to hold office, desire to be discharged, or refuse or become incapable to act, the successor in the office of the person so dying, ceasing to hold office, resigning, desiring to be discharged, or refusing or becoming incapable to act, shall be a trustee of the community fund in the place of the person so dying, ceasing to hold office, resigning, desiring to be discharged, or refusing or becoming incapable to act. But this provision shall not supersede the power of appointing new trustees, contained in such original conveyance and assignment, or declaration of trust, of any of the real estates, chattels real, or personal property, being the property of the community fund as aforesaid; but the person or persons for the time being entitled to exercise such appointment shall be requested to and shall exercise the same in accordance with the provisions of this statute, and shall appoint the person or persons aforesaid accordingly; and on every appointment of a new warden, superior, or treasurer, or any or either of them, all the property then vested in the surviving or continuing warden, superior, or treasurers for the time being, shall be so dealt with that the same may be effectually vested in such new warden, superior, or treasurers, and the surviving or continuing warden, superior, or treasurers, or if there shall be no surviving or continuing warden, superior, or treasurers, then in the new warden, superior, and treasurers only. The warden, superior, and treasurers for the time being shall pay all rents, dividends, and other annual produce, and all other moneys received from time to time, whether capital or annual income for, or belonging to, the community fund, into the hands of the bankers for the time being of such community fund, to the account and credit of "The community fund" of such institution; and such payment shall be a sufficient discharge to the warden, superior, and treasurers for the moneys so paid by them.

The council shall appoint one or more bankers, to whom shall be paid all moneys that may be received by the treasurer, collector, or any other person or persons, on account of the institution, whether for donations, annual subscriptions, or otherwise; and such moneys shall be drawn from the bankers, under such regulations and restrictions as shall from time to time be ordered by the council.

XXXVII. The treasurers shall keep an account book, in which shall be entered all moneys paid to them or to their credit, and of all moneys paid by them; and such account shall be audited on or before the 1st of May in every year, by the council, or any two members thereof (not being either of them a treasurer), deputed by the council to be the auditors for that occasion.

XXXVIII. All deeds and other muniments of title, and all such other documents and writings belonging to the institution, or relating thereto, or to the property thereof, as the council shall think fit, shall be kept at the bankers for the time being of the institution, unless the council shall direct the same, or any of them, to be kept in any other place.

Fundamental.

XXXIX. If from want of funds, or any other cause, the institution shall fail, the council shall have power, by the vote of not less than three-fourths of the members present, at each of two successive meetings specially called for that purpose, the second of such meetings being held at an interval of not less than one calendar month, nor more than three calendar months, from the day on which the first of such meetings shall have been held, to dissolve the institution, and to order the sale and conversion of the whole of the property and effects thereof, including the community fund (if any), both real and personal, into money; and the clear moneys produced thereby, after paying all expenses attending such sale and conversion, and all debts owing from or on account of the institution, shall be disposed of to such charitable purposes in connection with the Church of England, and in such manner, and if thought fit, in such shares or proportions as the council shall determine at a meeting specially called for that purpose, and which shall be held not less than three nor more than six calendar months after the sale shall have been completed.

Fundamental.

XL. No alteration shall be made in any fundamental statute of the institution, unless with the consent (which may be given in writing) of at least three-fourths of the council, nor shall any such change take effect without the sanction, in writing, of the visitor.

Fundamental.

RULES OF THE SISTERHOOD OF S. JOHN BAPTIST.

Community of S. John Baptist.

In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

The community of S. John Baptist is instituted for the diligent, faithful, and loving practice of spiritual and corporal works of mercy; more especially for the moral and spiritual restoration of fallen women, the receiving and training of orphans and children, the care of the sick and infirm, and for mission work both at home and abroad.

It consists of a sisterhood formed of two orders, and of associates, men and women.

The Sisterhood of S. John Baptist.

The sisters, called by the love of God into a special union with His only begotten Son, and to the blessing of carrying on such works of mercy as in the days of His ministry He instituted, humbly seek, through the sacramental power of a consecrated life, to cherish Christ in themselves, and reveal Him to others, so that, after the example of S. John Baptist, He in them may increase while they decrease, ever bearing witness to the True Light, and directing both themselves and others to the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world. Thus waiting and watching for His return, they long to prepare the way of their Lord, and to make straight in the desert a highway for their God.

The sisterhood is formed without vows, for the observance of the rules of poverty, chastity, and obedience, in which state of life the sisters offer themselves perpetually to God, to live alone for His glory, in the love of Jesus, and to serve Him in the persons of His poor and suffering ones.

Collect.

Almighty God, by Whose providence Thy servant John Baptist was wonderfully born, and sent to prepare the way of Thy Son our Saviour, by preaching of repentance, make us so to follow his doctrine and holy life, that we may truly repent according to his preaching; and after his example constantly speak the truth, boldly rebuke vice, and patiently suffer for the truth's sake; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Of the Sisterhood.

The sisters of S. John Baptist are of two orders.

The first order consists of two classes, choir and lay sisters.

The choir sisters say the office for the hours, and vote in chapters of the sisterhood.

The lay sisters do not by rule say the office, and have no vote in chapter.

The sisters of the second order embrace the sister's life for a period of three years at a time. They are not bound by rule to say the office, and have no vote in chapter.

Rules.

I. Sisters are admitted on probation by the warden and superior, after passing six months as postulants. The ordinary period of probation shall be,

For choir sisters, two years.

For lay sisters, four years.

After such probation, a sister, if desirous of joining the sisterhood, must obtain the approval of the warden and superior, and the consent of a majority of the confirmed sisters. She is then required to make a promise of obedience to the rules and regulations, in the chapel of the house, in a form approved by the visitor; and at the same time, or as soon after as possible, receives the benediction of the bishop, the visitor of the house.

Such shall be called confirmed sisters.

II. A confirmed sister cannot be removed except for some grave cause, to be determined by the concurrent judgment of the warden and superior, after the cause of complaint has been laid before the chapter, nor till such decision shall have been approved by the visitor.

III. The sisters shall preserve their own baptismal names.

IV. The offices of the sisterhood are as follows—

The Superior.	The Bursaress.
The Assistant Superior.	The Secretary.
The Mistress of the Novices.	The Infirmarian.
The Sisters Superior of the Branch Houses.	The Sacristan.
	The Precentor.

The superior is elected for three years, according to the statutes, but may be re-elected.

All other offices are appointed and changed at the discretion of the warden and the superior.

At the appointment or re-appointment of the superior, the assistant superior and the mistress of the novices cease to hold office, but they may be re-appointed.

Confirmed sisters only can hold offices in the sisterhood.

V. Sisters may not be sent as superiors of other sisterhoods.

VI. The confirmed sisters only shall have a voice in such matters as are by rule referred to the sisters.

VII. A general chapter shall be held in every year, on the Thursday next before S. Andrew's Day, at 11 o'clock, for the purpose of electing the counsel of finance for the ensuing year, and for the mutual consideration and arrangement of matters connected with the sisterhood and its works.

VIII. The superior shall be empowered, with the consent of the warden, to hold other chapters of the sisterhood, at other times, for the consideration of any subjects it is desired to submit to the judgment of the sisters.

IX. Subjects for consideration of the chapter can be introduced only with the consent of the warden, and notice of such subjects must be given by the superior to the sisters superior of the branch houses of the sisterhood, 15 days before the chapter is held. Such subjects may be discussed by the confirmed sisters among themselves, but may not be spoken of to anyone else.

X. The chapter shall commence with the invocation of the Holy Trinity, and the Collect for Whitsunday, to be said standing.

The sisters shall then take their seats in their proper order. The subjects to be discussed shall be proposed by the superior. The votes are taken in order, the youngest sister voting first.

The chapters shall close with the Collect for Quinquagesima Sunday, the Gloria Patri, and the Grace of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Appendix, No. 5.

XI. All acts of the chapter must be confirmed by the warden before they becom valid, when they shall be recorded by the secretary, in a book kept for that purpose, copies of which must be sent to the sisters superior of the branch houses within 15 days after being so recorded. Questions thus decided in chapter shall not be afterwards discussed.

XII. The chapters for voting for the appointment of the superior, or for the confirmation of a sister, shall be held in the chapel.

The confirmed sisters shall assemble in the chapel at the time fixed by the warden. After prayer for the guidance of the Holy Spirit, the warden standing on the step in front of the altar, shall receive the votes of the sisters, commencing with the youngest sister. Having examined the votes, he shall declare whether the sister is elected or not.

In case of want of unity in the votes, so that but a small majority is in favour of the confirmation, the decision shall be at the discretion of the warden.

After such decision, the election of sisters is not to be made a subject of discussion.

XIII. Sisters having no personal knowledge of the novice proposed for election may remain neutral.

XIV. The consent of the sisters in chapter must be obtained before any new work shall be undertaken by the sisterhood.

XV. Sisters who are able, are expected to contribute each 50 l. annually to the community fund, but this sum may be increased at the desire of any sister.

XVI. The sum to be contributed by each sister, shall be settled between herself and the warden and superior; the arrangement being strictly confidential.

XVII. In the event of any sister desiring to give or bequeath any property to the community, or any of its houses, she shall satisfy the visitor that she has informed the next of kin, or the next in degree, if more than one (or give to the visitor a sufficient reason for her not having done so), of her intention, that any objections on their part may be duly considered, and that they may have the opportunity of laying such objections before the visitor.

XVIII. Out of the fund so raised, a provision shall be made for the sisters in health, sickness, and old age.

XIX. The different works shall be distributed by the superior among the sisters, as far as possible, in distinct departments.

XX. In this distribution, the abilities and inclinations of each sister shall be as far as possible considered.

XXI. Each sister shall receive from the superior a time-table, in which the order and arrangement of her daily work, reading, &c., shall be definitely fixed. This time-table shall be subject to alteration, at the discretion of the superior.

XXII. The sisters shall give such reports of their work to the warden and superior as may be required.

XXIII. The services of the chapel, its internal arrangements and furniture, as well as the forms of prayer used in the sisterhood, shall be under the general control of the warden, subject to the authority of the visitor.

XXIV. The hours of common prayer in the chapel of the house, are,

Matins.	Nones.
Lauds.	Evensong.
Prime.	Vespers.
Terce.	Compline.
Sext.

When any of the sisters are prevented from being present at any of these services, it is desired that they should observe the hour, by uniting themselves in spirit with those who are engaged in the direct worship of God in the chapel.

XXV. The times of the several services shall be appointed, and may be varied as seems expedient, by the warden.

A bell shall be rung five minutes before each service.

XXVI. The Church service shall be read once at least every day.

The Litany shall be used on Wednesdays and Fridays.

XXVII. No sister shall absent herself from any service in chapel, except by the permission of the superior.

XXVIII. Every Friday evening, a special service of prayer shall be held by the sisters, for a blessing on the sisterhood and its associates, and the works in which they are engaged.

XXIX. The

XXIX. The Holy Communion shall be administered daily.

XXX. The superior shall allot to the sisters at least one hour daily, for private devotion and religious study.

XXXI. One day in every month shall, when it is possible, be allowed for self-examination and private devotion.

XXXII. The sisters, when absent from the sisterhood, are at liberty to go to any clergyman of the Church of England, approved by the warden, for counsel and advice.

XXXIII. As it is impossible for the members of such a body to live together in daily intimacy and affection without the religious exercises and devotional habits of one affecting another, the religious books and habits of devotion used in the sisterhood shall be such only as are allowed by the warden.

XXXIV. The hour of rising shall be 6 a.m.

XXXV. The sisters shall retire to their bed-rooms not later than 10 p.m., and shall be in bed by 11 p.m.

XXXVI. In case of sickness, or from other sufficient cause, the rule for rising in the morning may be relaxed by the superior, but her permission must first be obtained.

XXXVII. If any sister desire to practise greater abstinence, or to shorten the regular period of rest for the purpose of devotion, she must first obtain the consent of the warden and superior, and, if the latter think it necessary, of the medical attendant also.

XXXVIII. The fast days appointed by the Church of England shall be observed by abstinence from all superfluities, and from meat so far as may be consistent with health.

XXXIX. The food provided at the regular meals shall be always of a plain and simple character. No food shall be provided out of the ordinary meal times, except with the express permission of the superior.

XL. That the day may begin and close with devotion, the sisters shall retire to their rooms after the last hour of prayer, except for some necessary duty, and with the approval of the superior.

XLI. The sisters shall observe silence in going to and from chapel, and likewise within the chapel, whether service be going on or not, unless it be for some necessary cause.

XLII. The warden and superior shall have power, with the consent of the majority of the confirmed sisters, to appoint other times when silence shall be observed in the sisterhood.

XLIII. The dress of the sisters shall be plain and uniform, made according to regulation, and without any unnecessary ornament.

XLIV. The furniture of the rooms shall be such only as is consistent with an unaffected simplicity.

XLV. Fires shall be allowed in the sleeping-rooms only by the express permission of the superior.

XLVI. The sisters shall not pass the gates, but at such times, and in such companionship, as the superior shall approve.

XLVII. A sister shall not go to the town alone, except under special circumstances, and with express permission.

XLVIII. The absence of a sister from the sisterhood, the duration and purpose of such absence, must be previously approved by the superior; such absence shall not exceed one month in any one year, except in cases of urgency, to be allowed by the warden and superior.

XLIX. A sister, when absent from the sisterhood, must be on her guard to lead a life consistent with her religious character.

L. A sister, when absent from the sisterhood, shall not attend other religious services in this country than those of the Church of England.

LI. Conversation on controversial subjects shall be abstained from by the sisters and ladies working with them.

LII. The sisters shall have free intercourse with their relations, who may visit them at any time, but the visits of other friends and the time of such visits must be previously approved of by the superior.

LIII. The correspondence of the sisters with their relations and friends shall be free and unrestricted; but they shall be careful that it does not interfere with their rule of life and appointed work.

Appendix, No. 5.

LIV. Sisters engaged in works of charity in the parish must act under the directions of the parish priest. Alms can be given to the poor by sisters only with the consent of the superior, and out of a special fund provided for the purpose.

LV. The sisters shall be careful to show towards the different objects of their care, in manner and speech, courtesy, gentleness, and sympathy, with a reserve such as becomes their relative positions, and is consistent with prudence and charity.

LVI. The sisters shall not speak to the penitents, nor allow the penitents to speak to them, concerning their former sins.

LVII. The sisters shall not use with those under their care any book but such as the warden may approve.

LVIII. The sisters shall not give anything to the children, penitents, &c., for their use, without the knowledge and leave of the superior.

LIX. Especial care shall be taken as far as possible that the children or penitents shall never be left without a sister being with them; and at recreation, if possible, two sisters shall be present with them.

They shall be careful to speak respectfully of them among themselves and with strangers.

OF THE SISTERS OF THE SECOND ORDER.

The second order of S. John Baptist is founded for persons desiring to live as sisters, in obedience to the rule of the community, for a limited period.

Rules.

I. Persons desiring to become sisters of the second order, are admitted on probation by the warden and superior.

The ordinary period of probation shall be six months passed in the mother house; after which the probationer must obtain the approval of the warden and superior, and the consent of the confirmed sisters, when she shall be admitted a sister for a period of three years, according to the office appointed for that purpose.

II. At the expiration of the three years, she may be re-elected for another three years; and if so re-elected three separate times, the engagement may be renewed for similar periods without any further election.

III. The sisters of the second order live in obedience to the rule of the community, but they retain the control of their own money.

IV. They shall spend in work in connection with the sisterhood a certain portion of the year according to engagement made with the warden and superior.

V. Their rule and habit of life when absent from the sisterhood, shall be such as becomes persons thus devoted, and such as is approved by the warden and superior.

VI. They shall wear a fixed dress in the sisterhood, but in their own homes they may dress according to their ordinary use, only with as much simplicity as possible.

VII. They shall be called by the title of "Sister," but their surname shall be added to their Christian name.

VIII. If eventually a sister of the second order should be received into the first order, she may be admitted as a confirmed sister after one year's probation, provided she has been three years in the second order.

Of the Associates.

Associates are such persons, men or women, as are desirous of aiding the sisters, by undertaking to offer up certain prayers in behalf of their works, and to give some definite aid in furthering them.

They are remembered in the prayers of the community, and are admitted, when they desire it, and there be room sufficient, to the services in the chapel.

Such persons shall be called associates of the community of S. John Baptist.

They

They are divided into,

1. Associates living in the world, either married or single.

2. Associates specially devoted to works of mercy, living in the world, but not bound by family ties, and having permission to wear a distinctive habit.

These avoid balls, theatres, and other places of public amusement, and live a life becoming their religious habit.

RULES.

I. Persons wishing to become associates must be nominated by some member of the community to the warden (if men), to the warden and superior (if women), one clear month before their appointment; a copy of these rules being sent to them, meanwhile, for their perusal and careful consideration.

II. Their appointment shall be notified to them by the warden (if men), by the superior (if women), whereupon, as soon as may be, they shall be admitted associates according to the office prescribed for that purpose.

III. Their duties are—

1. To be careful to lead a life becoming their vocation—as in the world, but not of it—observing moderation in dress, habits, amusements, and general demeanour; humbly endeavouring to follow S. John Baptist in the path of Christian self-denial, and, "after his example, constantly speaking the truth, boldly rebuking vice, patiently suffering for the truth's sake," and ever pointing both themselves and others to "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world."

2. To help the sisterhood in any way that may be in their power.

3. To undertake some one definite work at least, in furtherance of the objects of the community.

The following modes of work are suggested:—

(a.) Collecting alms.

(b.) Giving personal aid in night, day, and Sunday schools; in missions, hospitals, gaols, workhouses, &c.

(c.) Visiting in their own dwellings the poor, the sick, the afflicted, the ignorant, the erring; not only to relieve and instruct, but also to cheer and console them with loving sympathy.

(d.) Seeking out the unbaptized, and (when needed) standing for them as sponsors; bringing the young to confirmation; and influencing the poor and untaught to frequent and value the Church's services, more especially the blessed Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ.

Duties special for Men.

(a.) Acting as officers or members of councils or committees in relation to the works of the sisterhood or any works of mercy.

(b.) Assisting in church choirs.

(c.) Helping at the desire of the clergy to promote order and decency in their churches, and reverence in their congregations.

(d.) Assisting the clergy at Divine service in such lesser offices as are open to the laity to discharge.

(e.) If they be priests, to celebrate the blessed Sacrament once a month for the community and its works; to endeavour to obtain offertories for the support of those works; and to be ready, if possible, to undertake service in any chapel or oratory connected with the community, when requested to do so.

Duties special for Women.

(a.) Rendering personal service in the works of the sisterhood, as opportunity offers, and home duties permit.

(b.) Providing needlework, receiving orders for it, or promoting its sale.

(c.) Procuring places of service for the penitents and children, and, if possible, watching over them in service.

(d.) To say daily a prayer for the community, they being themselves likewise specially remembered by the sisters each day at nones.

Appendix, No. 5.

(e.) To receive the blessed Sacrament (if possible) on the first Sunday in every month, with the intention of the prosperity of the community and its works; including in their preparatory examination of conscience a particular reference to their fulfilment of the "duties of associates" here specified.

(f.) To observe, as the commemoration day of the whole community, the festival of S. John Baptist, if possible, by receiving the blessed Sacrament with the intention of the community; or at least by uniting with its members in spirit on that holy day, and joining them in special acts of prayer and intercession.

IV. Associates are not allowed to attend other services besides those of the Church of England in this country.

V. Associates (women) are not allowed to attach themselves by a similar tie to any other sisterhood; but if they desire to become sisters, they are free to join any sisterhood in the English Church.

VI. Associates (women) may also, with the consent of their own superior, assist personally in the work of any other sisterhood, only taking care that the aid which they have engaged to give to their own sisterhood be not on that account superseded.

VII. Associates (women), if admitted to work in any other sisterhood, must faithfully observe its rule, cultivating a loving and generous spirit, and abstaining from all remarks calculated to cause comparisons between one sisterhood and another, or between their respective members.

Catholic Directory:

Reference to the "Catholic Directory" as not having official sanction from any superior authority in the Roman Catholic Church, Bagshawe 702-704——Limited sense in which the Catholic Directory is a work of authority; inaccuracy of the list of institutions given in the work, Harting 1046-1055.

For some years past witness's firm has printed the Catholic Directory, being employed in the matter by the Rev. Mr. Johnson, Robson 3122-3126. 3133-3137——The manuscript and corrections, which are received from Mr. Johnson, are in the handwriting of various persons, ib. 3128-3134.

The Directory was formerly edited by Canon Morris, the present editor being the Rev. W. A. Johnson, Cull 3145-3154——Preface to the Directory for 1869 adverted to with reference more especially to the compilation of the official portion of the work, ib. 3155——Preparation of the whole work by the editor, the advertisements only being under charge of the publisher, ib. 3156-3160.

Examination to the effect that the words "permissu superiorum," on the title-page of the Directory, have appeared for years, at the suggestion, probably, of the editor in the first instance, Cull 3161-3222——Degree of advantage attached by the publishers to the words "permissu superiorum"; the words are not, however, intended to convey that the book is printed "by authority" of the Roman Catholic Church, ib. 3176-3190. 3203-3211.

Witness has been editor of the Catholic Directory for the last three years; is also one of the secretaries of Archbishop Manning, Johnson 3223-3225——Entire absence of connection between witness's position as secretary and his position as editor, ib. 3225-3227. 3285——Editorial matter of which the first two parts of the Directory consist, this position of the work being collected and prepared entirely by witness, ib. 3228——Prefaces to the Directory for 1869 and 1870, and explanation therein with reference to the official portion of the work, ib. 3229-3233.

Examination explanatory of the use and signification of the words "permissu superiorum," witness denying that they convey the impression that the book is sanctioned by the authorities, Johnson 3286-3296. 3325-3331. 3348-3364——Intention of witness to omit in future the words "permissu superiorum," ib. 3351.

2. Evidence to a contrary Purport:

Witness submits in detail grounds for the conclusion that the Oratorians are a monastic institution, having property in common, Smee 2282 et seq.——Documents cited in support of the conclusion that the Oratory at Brompton is a community having common property; will of witness's relative adverted to hereon, ib. 2298–2314. 2336–2344.

Witness was a petitioner to the House of Commons in 1864 in the case of a relative, the Rev. William Hutchison, who died in Brompton Oratory, Smee 2279–2281.

Judgment of Sir James Wilde in the case of Smee v. Knox adverted to as being adverse to the pleas put in by witness, and as upholding the will of his relative, Mr. Hutchison, in which the latter left his property to the Superior of the Oratory; exceptions taken to this judgment, Smee 2284 et seq.——Statement on the question of Mr. Hutchison having been of unsound mind when his will was made; witness contends that his mind was weakened, and was in a very impressionable and feeble estate, ib. 2285, 2286. 2290. 2371–2383. 2422–2456——Desire of witness to have brought the case before the Court of Chancery, but that he has been deterred by the expense, ib. 2293–2297. 2483. 2490.

4. Statement and counter-Statement as to the Case of the Rev. W. Hutchison, &c.—cont^d.

Evasion of the law by the mode in which Mr. Hutchison disposed of his property by will; belief that a certain legacy left was but a blind, Smee 2350–2357. 2364. 2462–2471——The decision of Sir James Wilde was that witness had no reasonable ground for contesting the will, and must pay the costs, ib. 2385, 2386.

Further information relative to the peculiar dress worn by Mr. Hutchison, Smee 3390–3398——Reference to a certain written document, now produced, as necessary to complete witness's evidence on the subject of the case of Smee v. Knox, ib. 3399–3402.

6. Explanation as to the Property of the Oratory, and as to the Disposal of their Property by individual Members:

Dissent from the view of Sir James Wilde that the rules of the Oratory did not in any way affect the disposition of the property of the members; grounds for concluding on the other hand that the members are bound, as under a vow, to give up all their property to the institution, Smee 2287 et seq.

Possession by the Oratory of some property in common, which is vested in joint tenants, Gordon 2596. 2600, 2601. 2654–2656. 2762, 2763. 2802——Full power of each member of the Oratory to dispose of his property as he pleases, witness as Superior, having no control in this respect, ib. 2602–2605. 2612, 2613. 2624, 2625. 2762. 2777–2786—— Instances of the property of individual fathers having been devised away from the community, ib. 2626.

Explanation that witness has no desire that the institutions should be in any way privileged, or that vows should be recognised, by law, and that he merely contends for the removal by the Legislature of existing illegality and penalties, Bagshawe 683 et seq.; 770, 771. 806–810——Liability of monks to be proceeded against, on the ground that the taking of vows is illegal, ib. 715–750. 778–780.

Denial that in claiming relief from the statutory restrictions now in force, witness is really demanding an exceptional position for the Roman Catholic community in this country; that is, so far as the laws of England are concerned, Lord Clifford 2555–2557.

Opinion that the law requires a most careful revision, and that steps should be taken in the direction of removing the disabilities of which Roman Catholics complain, Hobhouse 3953. 3995–4014.

Absence of practical difficulty in dealing with property in respect of monasteries, though the institutions themselves are illegal; expediency however of removing the grievance involved in the necessary resort to the system of joint tenants in lieu of trusts being declared, Harting 1009–1027. 1132, 1133. 1187–1197——Internal regulations of the convents adverted to as not affecting in any way the rights of the joint tenants as to the property vested in them, 1158–1172.

Consideration of the legal effect of joint tenants, in whom property is vested, dying without any fresh nominations being made; conclusion that the property would go to an infant heir if there were one, Cuddon 1531–1542. 1578–1581.

Grievance on account of the necessity of leaving property to joint tenants absolutely instead of in being able to have trusts declared; evasion of the law on this score, Lord Clifford 2507–2511. 2586–2589.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, IN THE CHAIR.

The Right Honourable EDMUND HAMMOND, called in; and Examined.

Rt. Hon. E. Hammond.

7 March 1870.

1. Chairman.] YOU are Under Secretary of State at the Foreign Office?—I am the Permanent Under Secretary.

2. How long have you held that office?—For nearly 16 years; previously to that I was clerk for about 30 years. I entered the office in April 1824.

3. You are aware that there have been Committees of the House of Commons of recent years upon this subject?—Yes, there was one in 1861, before which I was examined; and there was one in 1850, partly upon the same subject. The principal Committee was in 1861, whose Report has been laid before you, and in my evidence before that Committee, I went into everything which I possibly could think of to elucidate the subject. I only hope that I shall be able to assist you now still further. Perhaps you will allow me to put in what I think will be rather a useful Paper for you, namely, the reports of our ministers abroad upon the working, so far as they have ascertained it, of the system laid down in 1861; and also upon the establishments maintained in foreign countries; and likewise the cost of living now as compared with the year 1850. There is a great deal of information in that Paper, though it is not a very large Return.

4. Are these two circulars from the Foreign Office?—Yes; the collection of Papers will be laid upon the table to-night, and copies will be available to-morrow morning.

5. Are you able to state generally to the Committee what changes have been made in the diplomatic service in consequence of the Report of the Committee of 1861?—There have been no very material changes; I should say scarcely any. A greater development has been given to promotion, at the recommendation of the Committee, beginning earlier, and also emolument as regards the class of unpaid attachés. If you look back at the Report of the Committee you will see that they recommended that after four years' service unpaid attachés should receive commissions as third secretaries, with a proportionate salary, and those who were then unpaid attachés, and had served four years, thereupon received commissions. I am not quite sure that the second point is a recommendation of the Committee, but it naturally followed from the first. The effect of that was that we removed a great hardship from the junior branch of the service, inasmuch as according to the Act of Parliament, their pension, however long their service might be, did not date till they received their first commission under the sign manual. The Committee strongly recommended that that grievance should be done away with; and accordingly, as soon as arrangements could be made, every second secretary then existing, and every attaché who had served for four years, and had qualified himself by passing his examinations, received a commission, and became qualified for pension from that date or on completing four years from the date of his appointment as attaché.

6. The Resolution of the Committee of 1861 was, "That there be two classes of examination previous to admission into the service, a first and second, the candidate selecting which he will undergo; if he pass the first he will be exempted from any further examination"?—The regulation first made after the Report of the Committee allowed candidates for attachéships to decide whether they would undergo one or two examinations. Inconvenience was felt in this arrangement, inasmuch as in consequence of the severity of a single examination, six months were necessarily allowed for preparation, and the result was, that an attaché was not ready to go abroad for nearly a year after his nomination; and therefore, in 1865 two examinations were made imperative, the second to take place between the grant of a commission as third, and that of a commission as second secretary.

Rt. Hon. E. Hammond.

7 March 1870.

7. What is the present mode of admission into the diplomatic service?—Nomination by the Secretary of State.

8. And a pass examination, and a certificate?—There is a certificate.

9. Are three or four gentlemen nominated at each examination?—No, only one is nominated.

10. Then he has to pass?—Yes; there is a competitive examination for clerks, but there is no competitive examination for the diplomatic service.

11. Do all the attachés go through a course of employment in the Foreign Office?—Yes, for six months; it was thought that in the Foreign Office they would acquire a general idea of business, and would become very useful attachés by being so employed.

12. Are they all fitted for the different positions?—Yes; according to the requirements of the service.

13. After four years' service as unpaid attachés, do they become third secretaries?—Yes; if they have fulfilled the conditions of passing their examination, and have resided for three years at a foreign court, and if their character is good, and there is a certificate of the minister to that effect, they receive their commission as third secretary, and get their salary of 150*l.* a year from that date.

14. Is there an examination at the period of a gentleman's transition from being an attaché to being third secretary?—No; but he must pass his second examination in order to obtain the position of second secretary. A man need not pass this second examination before his nomination as third secretary; but there must be two examinations from the day of his nomination as attaché before he gets his commission as second secretary.

15. Is there an Order in Council, or any official document regulating all this?—No; the Order in Council does not apply to the examination of attachés.

16. That has all been done by the order of the Foreign Secretary?—Yes, by the order of the Foreign Secretary, carrying out the principle of the Order in Council applicable to the Civil Service generally.

17. Is there any rule established with regard to the advancement of the service, so that a member of the diplomatic body would be entitled to promotion after a certain period of service, or is it arbitrary?—There is no rule laid down. In advancing from an attaché to a secretary of legation, I think that, as a general rule, all go up in regular succession; there is no selection. The Secretary of State is not debarred from making a selection, but, as a general rule, I should say that every attaché, and every second and third secretary, has in his turn the option of going up to a vacancy which may occur in the class above him.

18. Speaking generally, it is a seniority service?—Yes, so far as respects the secretary of legation, and I believe very nearly so far as respects the secretary of an embassy; it is practically a seniority service, but not compulsorily.

19. Is the promotion slow or rapid?—I am afraid that the promotion is not so rapid as we could wish, and as the parties themselves would desire.

20. Have you a tabular statement of the number of gentlemen in the diplomatic service, with their various offices?—I can give it to you. This red book, which is called "The Foreign Office Guide," though not considered by us an official book, is corrected in the office; and here it appears that there are five ambassadors, namely, at Vienna, St. Petersburg, Paris, Berlin, and Constantinople.

21. Has there not been an addition to that number in recent years?—I think that the last creation of an embassy was that of Berlin in 1862.

22. That was previously a minister's post, was it not?—Yes; Sir Andrew Buchanan was named as ambassador at Berlin in October 1862, and he was the last ambassador that was created.

23. Is there any difference between the functions of a minister and of an ambassador, except that one represents the sovereign and the other the country?—The great advantage of an ambassador is, that he has direct access to the sovereign to whom he is accredited.

24. And that is as the personal representative of his sovereign?—Yes, as the personal representative of the Queen. He has a right to demand an audience, which cannot be denied to him; an envoy cannot demand it as a right, but I do not say that he does not obtain it if he applies for it.

25. The salary which is paid to the ambassadors is rather higher than that which is paid to the ministers, is it not?—Yes, because the expense involved in their position is greater; the style of living at an ambassadorial court is much higher than it is at other courts where ambassadors do not reside.

26. Is it expected from the office of an ambassador that he should live in greater state, and at a higher expense than a minister?—I should say so; an ambassador (particularly an English ambassador) suffers from the practice that tradesmen in any place put on a per-centage in proportion to the rank which the person holds; I think that you will find an observation to that effect in the Papers which I have laid before you, namely, that generally the diplomatic body pay in a higher proportion than any of the residents in the place; and I believe that it may be safely affirmed, that if the general diplomatic body pay higher, the English ambassador pays higher than a foreign ambassador; they have an idea abroad that an Englishman is necessarily possessed of large means, and therefore they think that they can safely charge him accordingly.

27. Then you think that the difference of salary between that of a minister and that of an ambassador, does not really represent the difference of advantage to the gentleman who holds the latter position?—I think not; I feel very sure that that none of our ambassadors can live, without, to a certain extent, applying part of their own personal income, in order to eke out the salary which the Government afford them.

28. You think that the official salary does not adequately represent the income of the ambassador?—I believe so.

29. Is the salary of the different classes of secretaries a fixed amount, or is there a scale?—It differs; perhaps I can assist the inquiry of the Committee by putting before them a document, which though perhaps not strictly official, being prepared for my private reference, applies to the present inquiry; the salary varies according to the place; but if I understand you rightly, you mean that there is not a scale for length of service. There is not.

30. Is a third-class secretary paid a certain salary, and is a second-class secretary paid a certain salary?—It varies; in the same manner as paid attachés were formerly divided into two classes, one receiving 400*l.* a year, and the other 250*l.* a year, so some of the second secretaries receive different amounts.

31. The amount varies according to the place?—Yes, it varies according to the place in which the man resides; this, I believe, is the estimate for diplomatic expenditure proposed to be presented to the House (producing a document), though it is not yet an official document; that estimate has gone into the Treasury, and I believe that the Treasury accept it.

32. The third secretaries all have a fixed salary?—Yes, of 150*l.* a year.

33. The second secretaries have a varying salary, according to the importance of the place?—Yes; and also with reference to the expense of living in a place; but it is not a salary upon which, I believe, any one of them can live even when on the highest scale.

34. Is it a condition of the diplomatic service that the gentlemen who are engaged in it must have independent means of their own; I do not mean to ask whether it is an express condition, but whether it is a necessary condition?—It is a necessary condition, because when a young man is appointed an attaché he cannot know to what place he will be appointed, and if he goes to St. Petersburgh, or Berlin, or Vienna, or Paris, he must be prepared to spend at the least 600*l.* a year in the position in which he ought to occupy, and he would live very badly upon that at St. Petersburgh.

35. I will ask you, generally, whether you have found that the examinations have improved the status and ability of the gentlemen who have passed through them?—That is rather an invidious question for me to answer, because if I spoke too favourably of them I might, perhaps, be considered to disparage those who had come into the service before; but I think that since the examinations have taken effect, we have obtained for the service a set of most able, and most attentive young men, and whose conduct is altogether satisfactory; I think that the members of this Committee, if they look to the reports of the secretaries of legation, which are periodically published, will see in them proof of great industry, great ability, and great zeal, and I may add, that the Committee will shortly have before them some most valuable information upon which our secretaries have been employed for five or six months, concerning the land tenure in foreign countries, which information has been obtained with reference to the Bill now before Parliament. It has been so voluminous, that we have not been able to publish it sooner. I believe that the report of one of the gentlemen extends over between 300 and 400 folio pages, and, in point of fact, our printers are regularly swamped with the work. I am pressing them on as much as I can, and I hope to have it out in a week or a fortnight. Then there is another report which has been furnished, and which will be shortly printed, namely, upon the industrial classes in foreign countries, which report will afford a great deal of very valuable and interesting information.

36. Who first established those reports?—Lord Clarendon.

37. When was the rule respecting such report to which you allude made?—I think that it was made in 1856. It originated in this circumstance, that it had become necessary to make an inquiry into the Baltic consulates, and Lord Augustus Loftus, who was then secretary of legation at Berlin, was employed upon it. The result of the inquiry was so satisfactory, and the report was so clear, that Lord Clarendon considered that it would be a very great advantage to the service, as a lesson, and to the public generally, for information, if all our secretaries of legation were desired to make two reports in a year upon matters connected with the commerce, the industry, and the general state of society in the country in which they lived. Those reports have been presented with more or less regularity of late years. I am afraid that this year they have not been quite so regular, because our secretaries have been taken off this year, in order to make special reports, which have, of course, occupied their time, and prevented them from making those reports, which, in a general way, they were required to make under the instructions of 1856. Some years afterwards (I forget now exactly who was Secretary of State) it was determined to utilise in a similar way the class of second secretaries, not with a view to their reports being sent home and published, as the others, but generally to utilise them for the service of the minister, in the same manner as the clerks of the Foreign Office are utilised for the service of the Secretary of State: namely, we recommended to the heads of missions to employ the junior members of the mission in working up subjects upon which the minister himself would eventually have to report to the Secretary of State, just in the same manner as if any question is required to be worked out in the Foreign Office, it is delivered to the proper division of the office, and the senior clerk either himself undertakes the work, or delegates it to some of his juniors. It is a practice which we consider to be the very best training, and any person who had ever been connected with the office as Parliamentary Under Secretary, or as Secretary of State, answering for the business of the office, would agree with me that the rapidity with which, from habit, our clerks are able to get in a few hours what is wanted with regard to a question, in order to enable it to be answered in the House of Commons, is almost marvellous. It has frequently happened to me, both before and since I have been Under Secretary of State, to have, perhaps, a dozen questions placed before the office, at about one or two o'clock, answers to which were to be ready before the meeting of the House, and they have accordingly been ready.

Rt. Hon. E. Hammond.

7 March 1870.

That is the principle with which we have endeavoured to inspire our foreign missions, because there is no greater proof of a man's capacity than the power of concentrating in a small space, with rapidity, the substance of a mass of information which has to be sought here and there, and in different books.

38. Has that system worked satisfactorily in the foreign missions?—Of course I am not able to say, because I am not acquainted with the results. I hear no complaint from any foreign minister of the insufficiency of his attachés; on the contrary, whenever any foreign minister has occasion to speak of his subordinate members he speaks of them in unqualified praise.

39. Do you receive reports from the chiefs of the missions as to the conduct of the subordinate members?—No, I should object to that.

40. Why?—Because I think that it would be likely to produce heart-burning, and suspicion, and discontent in a mission, if it was known that these confidential reports were sent in. I think that upon a larger scale it has been very much objected to. Those confidential reports have, I believe, been resorted to in some branches of the public service, but I should be sorry to import that system into our service, where the men are few in number, and where in each mission a feeling of distrust might cause an unpleasantness between the chief of the mission and his subordinates, and might not render the relations as comfortable as they ought to be.

41. Do you think that there would be a feeling of favouritism?—I think that all those things had better be avoided. I have always wished to see the missions conducted on the same principle as that upon which we conduct the Foreign Office, namely, perfect confidence, perfect goodwill, and no suspicion. We find that system work admirably in the office. More work is done in the Foreign Office than people will give it credit for, because the men there work with a will, and with an esprit de corps, and there is no heart-burning among them.

42. Is the promotion in the Foreign Office a seniority promotion?—Yes; it must be a very decided incapacity which would prevent a man going up to a first class junior clerk. We must exercise our power of selection for the assistant and for the senior clerks, but at the same time in my experience in the office I have had more pleasure than I can describe in once or twice after having had to stop a man's promotion, finding him afterwards qualified for it, and recommending him accordingly on a vacancy, when he has fully done justice to my recommendation. I mean that you cannot judge, and it is hard to judge, of a man until he is put into a position to act. Our junior clerks do a great deal of confidential work, but it is not always that they are in charge. I have opportunities, from absence of service on account of illness, and one thing and another, of testing the quality of our junior clerks, and although I would naturally much rather have the assistance of the senior in charge, I feel that nothing will go wrong even when I have only a junior. The efficiency of juniors as well as seniors arises from the habit which they have of paying attention to everything.

42*. You would debar yourself from that personal knowledge of the character of the gentlemen in a foreign mission by having no communication with the chiefs?—We conclude that if a minister is dissatisfied with his subordinate, we shall hear of it. If the minister does not report a defaulter it is his own fault. Generally speaking, we know pretty well the character of the men without asking for reports. From the way in which the members of the diplomatic body are thrown into connection with the members of the Foreign Office, we know pretty well what the character of a man is.

43. You are able to ascertain the character of each man?—Yes, generally, without any invidious manner of ascertaining it. I am very anxious to maintain the principle; the good fellowship among all the members of our service, either at home or abroad, has been such that I should be very sorry to take any other measures which would imply looking more closely after their proceedings. If I knew that any young man was not leading the life which he ought to lead, and was inattentive to his duty, I should think it my duty both to the young man himself, and to his family, and to the service generally, to have a hint conveyed to him in some indirect way or another that his shortcomings had been noticed, but it would be a very extreme case in which I should recommend an official reprimand to be given to any young man; it only disheartens him. If he has any good feeling he will take the hint; it will have an effect upon him, and it will produce a better effect upon him than if you gave him a formal reprimand.

44. I have asked you with regard to the promotion of the secretaries; does the same reply apply to the steps between the legation and the ministers, namely, that it is according to seniority?—I should say so, generally. It must depend very much upon the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State being responsible, must necessarily be at liberty to pass over any person whom at the time being he may not think sufficiently qualified to fill a vacant post.

45. But at the same time, as I understand you, there is a fair expectation on the part of the secretaries that they may ultimately become ministers if they discharge their duties properly?—Certainly. The Secretary of State cannot be tied down (in the interests of the country) to a seniority promotion. We consider that it would be a very strong measure to pass over a clerk in the order of promotion, supposing that he was qualified for it, but no clerk in the office would have ground to complain if the office of Under Secretary of State should become vacant, and it was not conferred upon him.

46. Are there any instances recently of secretaries of legation having been taken from outside the service?—There is the case of Mr. Wade in China.

47. He was previously in a different position, was he not?—He was Chinese secretary, and nobody could compete with Mr. Wade, in his qualification for the combined office of secretary of legation and Chinese secretary. Excepting Mr. Wade, I believe, every one has passed through the step of paid attaché. Mr. Thomson and Mr. Dickson at Teheran did not pass through the step of unpaid attaché. They were conversant with the Persian language, and having long served in Persia they had a fair claim for the appointments they hold in the Persian Mission. With respect to the secretaries of embassy they have all been paid attachés. With regard to the Chargés d'Affaires and Consul General, Mr. Bunch

Bunch was imported from the Consular Service, and I rather think that Mr. St. John was also imported from it; but Mr. Thomson, now in Chili, was secretary of legation in Persia. The greater part of the ministers, except Sir Rutherford Alcock, Mr. Matthew, Mr. Ward, Admiral Harris, Sir C. Wyke, and Sir Harry Parkes, were appointed in the regular course. In fact I may say that, generally speaking, almost all of our ambassadors and ministers have passed through the grade of paid attaché. Admiral Harris was originally in the Consular Service, also Sir Charles Wyke, Sir Rutherford Alcock, Mr. Matthew, Sir Harry Parkes, and Mr. Ward.

48. What steps do you take in order to secure that a gentleman has a knowledge of the Eastern languages?—I am sorry to say that an attempt which we made many years ago broke down. The late Lord Palmerston appointed four gentlemen, who were taken, I believe, from the universities, with a view of establishing at Constantinople the same system which was established in Persia, namely, that we should have interpreting attachés in Turkey, without the necessity of any regular dragomans, but it failed.

49. For what reason did it fail?—I would rather not answer that question; but of those four persons who were appointed, we have to regret the death of Lord Strangford and also the death of Mr. Wood. Mr. Doria is secretary of legation at Lisbon, and Mr. Hughes is now Oriental secretary at Constantinople.

50. That scheme has altogether fallen through?—Yes. We regretted it very much, but it is less to be regretted now because the Turkish ministers and high officers are generally conversant with the French language, and therefore our ambassador, I am happy to say, can transact his own business at the Porte almost unaided.

51. Directly?—Yes; he can go and see the Turkish Minister. We still want dragomans at Constantinople, because, in the first place, official papers are written in Turkish, and, in the next place, people in ordinary business do not generally understand Turkish; but, for confidential business, I hope that we are very nearly free from the necessity of employing dragomans. However, Sir Henry Elliot is in town, and will be able to attend the Committee, and he can explain his own practice much better than I can myself; but it has been the object of the Foreign Office, for many years past, to exempt the ambassador from the necessity of employing other mouths to execute his own confidential business, and I believe that we find that Turkish ministers like that system very much better. I remember, many years ago, speaking to a Turkish ambassador on the subject, and I believe that nothing would give the Turkish ministers more satisfaction than direct communication with English agents, as a general rule. I have no fault to find with any of our dragomans; they are, I believe, perfectly trustworthy; but there is a certain room, which is called the dragomans' room, where the dragomans of all powers congregate, and where there is probably more discussion on public affairs than is desirable.

52. You think that, for all important matters, the state of knowledge of French possessed by our high officers is sufficient for direct communication?—Yes; it was so with Fuad Pacha, and it is so now with Aali Pasha. I am not able to state the extent to which other Turkish ministers possess the knowledge. I think that some of them do.

Rt. Hon. E. Hammond.

7 March 1870.

53. There was a Resolution of the Committee of 1861, namely, that it was desirable to have a residence for a term of years, where it was practicable, for the British Embassy or Mission: has that Resolution been acted upon?—Yes, I believe so, to a certain extent. In the case of the Berlin Embassy, and also of the St. Petersburgh Embassy, I believe that the residence has been taken for a term of years, and I think that in the case of the Vienna Embassy it has also been taken for a term of years. At St. Petersburgh we could not get a house for the Embassy under 1,200*l.* a year, and it was thought that the public should not be charged more than 1,000*l.* a year for house-rent, and, therefore, it was settled that the ambassador should sacrifice 200*l.* a year of his salary, in order to make up the amount.

54. The difference being paid by the public?—Yes. At Brussels, I think the salary, which used to be 3,600*l.*, is now 3,480*l.*, the other 120*l.* being paid in aid of house-rent. Perhaps you will allow me to say, with all due deference, that the fact of taking a residence on lease, though very convenient for the ambassador, and for the public service, is not a very economical arrangement for the public, because it involves repairs, and other things, which might have been avoided if the house had been otherwise taken. At the present moment there is a very serious dilapidation to the mission house at Madrid. I have a Despatch to-day, which gives the estimate for the repair of that house, which will have to be repaired at the Government expense. If it were possible for a minister to take a house by the year, as he wanted it, perhaps it might be the most economical arrangement. At the same time, it puts a minister to a great difficulty when he first comes into a place; it may be three or four months before he can get a suitable residence. We have known that that has been the case in various instances. I have known not only our own ministers, but ministers of foreign powers have to wait for months before they could get a suitable residence.

55. What is the rule with respect to the archives of an embassy, or the custody of its documents, after the minister terminates his service, when the minister is changed?—They are handed over to his successor; the instruction is to hand over the archives, the ciphers, and the deciphers, and any other public property, to his successor. He first hands them over to the custody of the chargé d'affaires, who hands them over to the in-coming minister.

56. Do not those things accumulate very much?—Yes; if they did so, inconveniently, we should have them home. It is a very great convenience to have the mission archives on the spot, so that they may easily be referred to, because reference to old archives is very frequently necessary.

57. Is there any rule as to the archives being transmitted here after a certain date?—No; I do not imagine that there is any amount of archives before 1815.

58. Taking a mission of importance, such as that of St. Petersburgh, are all the documents and archives maintained there?—I apprehend that they are.

59. They must be of an enormous amount?—Yes; but at the same time I should be extremely sorry to have them brought over here, because I can judge of the wants of an embassy by our own wants. Some years ago we had to go back and to search our archives as far back as the year 1780. At present within the walls of our Foreign Office, we can keep our archives in possession as far back as 1783, and we are constantly referring to old papers.

Rt. Hon. E. Hammond.

7 March 1870.

60. Anterior to that time they are in the State Paper Office?—Yes; I believe that our librarian would be very glad to have papers 200 years before that time. Even when there was a State Paper Office almost adjoining our office, great inconvenience was felt from the want of ready access to papers to which we could not give accommodation in our own premises. The hours in the State Paper Office were much more reasonable than our hours. Very often at six or seven o'clock we wanted a reference going back to some distant period, but the State Paper Office was shut. Very often on a Sunday I want such a reference; I can get it on a Sunday in our office, because we have a person in the house who knows where to find it, but I could not get it from the State Paper Office. No person excepting a person who has been working in the office knows the inconvenience of delay in getting what you want. If you can get it in a short space of time you may look at it, but beyond that time you may not have the leisure to look at it for two or three days. Very often if I am delayed for 10 minutes for a paper I cannot deal with the subject for the rest of the day.

61. Then I understand that the Minister for the time being is responsible not only for the documents of which he himself has had possession, but for the antecedent documents?—Yes; I should hold him responsible for the whole of them. The correspondence is periodically bound, and then I presume that it is deposited in cases. We are always very ready to have the correspondence bound for its preservation, and it is done for uniformity sake, and for convenience. We have enjoined upon the missions the duty of keeping registers of their correspondence, such as we keep in the Foreign Office, so as to enable papers to be discovered immediately. We have registers in the Foreign Office; we have only to look through our registers when requiring to make an examination of papers going over several years, and we then obtain them in a very short time, and that is the system which has been directed to be observed in our missions abroad. Attachés who have seen the working of the Foreign Office before they have gone out to missions know our system of registration, which is perfect. It was only the other day that the American Minister applied to us to inform his secretary how we kept our registers; he was very much pleased with our system. We know that it is a perfect system.

62. The last Resolution of the Committee of 1861 had reference to the salaries and allowances of the larger missions, and the attention of the Secretary of State was called to the point, of whether they were adequate to the increased expenses of living; has that point ever been under the attention of the Secretary of State since that time?—Only in a few instances. I can give you a Paper, which, perhaps, will enable you to ascertain that matter (producing the same). This was the estimate which was before the Committee in 1861, and in the margin is the estimate as it stands now. I have another Paper which I think it might be interesting to the Committee to have put in, namely, the salaries and allowances of Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service, and the incidental expenditure thereof, from 1815 to 1869, both years included. It is not made quite uniform, because part of the figures are taken from some old Parliamentary Returns, and therefore one set of figures are in a certain form, and other figures are in a different form. The object for which I framed the latter part of this Return was to show how the fund of 1832 was administered.

63. The incidental expenses do not appear in the second Paper?—No; but I have taken out the incidental expenditure from 1854, and I will complete it for the intervening period.

64. Are the extraordinary expenses and the incidental expenses equivalent?—Yes, they are the same thing; they are sometimes called extraordinary expenses, and sometimes incidental expenses.

65. Is there anything else which you wish to put in?—There are two or three little details connected with the service, which, if the Committee wish, I will read to them. These are the regulations as to the extraordinary expenses. I think the Committee might also wish to have the scale of outfit.

66. This is the settled scale of outfit?—Yes. I have also thought that it might be convenient to the Committee, with reference to the book which I put before them, to take out the salaries, and to have a comparative statement of the expense of the diplomatic service of the principal countries in that respect. I believe that that will save a great deal of trouble to the Committee.

67. Is this a Return of the statements as regards the different nations in the Diplomatic Service?—Yes; it is a Return which is abstracted from the reports upon the Diplomatic Service.

68. Are there any observations which you wish to make to the Committee with respect to that matter?—I wish to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that the French Diplomatic Service is more expensive, as far as salaries go, than ours. We are in excess of all the rest. The United States are in the proportion of one-third to ours; but a point to which I wish to call the attention of the Committee (and it is a a point very much mooted) is the relative expenditure of England and the United States. The United States have not the same interest in the diplomacy of Europe as we have, therefore their expenditure in Europe may well be less. In South America, where their interests are greater than they are in Europe, they exceed our expenditure by nearly 3,000 l. a year; and that is not an expenditure on commercial grounds alone. I have another Paper which perhaps might interest the Committee, which I have had taken out, as bearing upon that particular question, namely, the total value of the export and import trade of the United Kingdom, with the various states of South America, in the year 1868. Now our trade was 34,000,000 l. altogether. There is no distinction, for instance, showing exactly the American trade, but our trade with Brazil was about 13,000,000 l., the whole trade of Brazil being about 33,000,000 l. thus we had a very large proportion of that trade. I do not know the extent of American interest in the Brazilian trade. The proportion of trade with Peru and Chili is also very much in our favour vour. I only cite these cases as showing that ie American expenditure for diplomatic inter- ourse with the states of South America was uch more out of proportion to the American ade than our expenditure was to the British ade. I will put in that Paper.

69. Mr. Frederick Stanley.] Transfers have een made very much more of late years; that to say, persons who have been secretaries of gation, and so on, have been transferred from one lace to another, much more often than was rmerly the case; is not that so?—They have nly been transferred as vacancies have arisen.

70. It has not become the practice of the office transfer the junior members of legation more an was formerly the custom?—The Committee f 1861 were of opinion that a junior should ot remain more than two years at a place, and far as I understand that seems now to be ie general rule.

71. In reference to the Report of the Com- ittee of 1861, have not the junior members f a mission been transferred more often than as formerly the case; and is it not the fact at they have not been continued in the same lace for the same length of time?—I am ot able to draw a comparison, but I can only y that the rule is not to allow a junior to re- ain more than two years at the same place. It sometimes more and sometimes less, but that is he rule which as far as we can we adhere to.

72. Do you consider that that would have an nfluence for good or for evil upon the quality of he reports which they are now in the habit of ransmitting, with regard to the general con- itions of the countries in which they reside?— The gentlemen whom you are speaking of do not ake the reports; it is only the secretaries of egation who make reports.

73. Those gentlemen are not employed in col- ecting information for the purpose of those eports?—No. They would very likely assist the ecretary of legation, but it is not a part of the uty officially prescribed to them. It would be ust a matter of private friendship. I should not onsider that it was a duty obligatory upon the econd secretary to collect materials for the secre- ary of legation.

74. You do not think that the reports would be t all influenced by the change of the junior mem- ers?—Certainly not; and, on the other hand, it s very advantageous to a young man himself to ove about to different parts of the world, by hich he acquires a knowledge of different coun- ries. I am speaking of advantage professionally. do not mean to say that it is an advantage pecuni- rily, because it very often exposes a man to con- iderable expense when he shifts his quarters. But if you did not lay down a rule of that kind here would be a charge of favouritism in the rofession, and it would be alleged that some men lways got the best positions and others got the vorst. Perhaps I may say that the Under Secre- ary of State has nothing to do with the appoint- ent of any person serving under the Foreign Office; that is entirely within the discretion of he Secretary of State. I should be very glad to ee a rule were laid down (though I differ from n ambassador upon that point), namely, that the unior members of the diplomatic service should egin their career at a small mission and should ork up to the higher missions. I am of opinion, or instance, that a person in South America will ick up a great deal of information which will stand him in good stead when he is appointed to other missions, but which he would not have acquired if he had only remained at an European mission. Questions of international law turn up constantly there, which in well-ordered communities do not arise so often as they do in the unsettled state in which unfortunately many of the States in South America are found.

75. Mr. Arthur Russell.] Have the secretaries abroad, and the clerks in the Foreign Office at home, availed themselves of exchange?—Not permanently; we have two clerks from the Foreign Office working now for a time abroad, when, if they come home, I have no doubt that the Secretary of State will consent to other clerks doing the same; if he finds second or third secretaries wishing to exchange with them for a time. Two or three of our clerks, I know, are very anxious to go abroad. We miss the assistance of well-trained clerks, for the best trained men coming from abroad can not supply their place; they are unacquainted with cases and current matters to which a trained clerk could at once refer.

76. Do you think it useful for those persons who have served for many years abroad, to come home and work at intervals in the office?—I think that what they do in the beginning of their career is useful: I should be very glad, at any time, to see them work in the office, so long as they did not interfere with the class in the Foreign Office above a first-class junior; above that class I think that we must keep our clerks. On the other hand, I should be sorry to make a change compulsory, because, in the first place, the regular routine of the office is rather irksome to a secretary who, though abroad he may have a great deal to do, does it in a different way. Moreover, secretaries coming from abroad would live very cheaply at home; but it would be very hard to impose upon our Foreign Office clerks, whose salary is not very high, compulsory residence abroad, where they must spend 500 l. or 600 l. a year. A clerk in London can live tolerably well upon his salary with moderate assistance, even if does not live with his family, but he cannot do so abroad. In a pecuniary point of view it might be advantageous to a secretary coming to England, but it would be hard upon our clerks to send them abroad, for it would entail upon them a much greater expense than they incur in England.

77. Did I understand you rightly to say that the English ambassador is charged more than his French or Austrian colleagues in the same town?—I can only say so conjecturally.

78. Cannot he ascertain the fact?—It is very difficult to fight against excessive charges. There is no reason why a diplomatist should be charged more than an inhabitant of the place, bnt he is so charged; that is stated, I think, in two papers that I have laid before the Committee. There is a diplomatic price, and a residential price; and my impression is, that an English diplomatist abroad will probably be charged more than others.

79. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] You do not mean to imply that an ambassador would be charged more than a minister would be charged?—An ambassador might be charged according to his position.

80. I think you said that Sir Charles Wyke and Mr. Murray were promoted from the consular service into the diplomatic service?—Yes; Sir

Rt. Hon. E. Hammond.

7 March 1870.

Charles Murray was in the Queen's household, and from thence he was removed to be secretary of legation at Naples; and therefore he did not pass through the lower grades of the profession.

81. It is the custom to remove consuls general to high diplomatic offices, is it not?—No; it is an exception.

82. When such an instance takes place, is it considered by the diplomatic service generally to be to their injury?—I conclude that it is so considered, of course, because it fills up a vacancy which members of the profession might themselves hope to supply, and so far retards the regular promotion in the diplomatic line.

83. Supposing that there was a secretary of embassy, who was very competent for a post which was vacant, and that there was a man equally fitted in the consular service, would it be considered very unusual for the Foreign Office, contrary to the routine of the service, to promote a consul to the post?—Certainly.

84. That is to say, unless there were very strong grounds for promotion from the other service?—Yes.

85. And still more so in the case of a person who did not belong to either of the professions?—The Secretary of State has always reserved to himself the right of selecting any person, without reference to whether he belonged to the profession or not, to fill a particular mission.

86. If it became at all a practice for people belonging either to the consular service, or to either of the two services, to receive diplomatic appointments, would it not be considered a very great discouragement to the lower grades of the diplomatic service?—I should be sorry to see it adopted as a general rule.

87. If it were adopted at all, as a general rule, do you think that it would be difficult to find persons to compete for the lower posts of diplomacy?—I can hardly pronounce an opinion upon that question, but I may say that I find it hard to understand why any person enters the service at all, as his prospects are so very bad.

88. Even at present?—Yes; it is my advice to all persons who ask my opinion not to enter the service; but I nevertheless find them entering it.

89. Is it not generally considered in the profession that it is simply the chance of getting these larger posts which induces young men to put up with their inferior position for many years?—I am not able to answer that question.

90. So far as your present knowledge of the diplomatic service is concerned, do you consider that the persons in that service are fully competent for the highest post of the service; I mean in their different gradations?—In their different gradations they are fully competent for advancement according to their standing.

91. When a higher post falls vacant, is it ever considered at the Foreign Office that there are not competent men to fill that post?—I cannot answer that question, seeing that I have nothing to do, as Under Secretary of State, with the appointment of any diplomatic, or indeed any other person; the question must be asked of the Secretary of State.

92. You have nothing to do with the appointment of diplomatic persons?—I have nothing at all to do with the appointment of any person connected with the diplomatic or any other service. If the Secretary of State asks my opinion upon an appointment which he contemplates, of course it is my bounden duty to give him m opinion, but I cannot appoint or fix a salary, o increase or diminish a salary, or do anything o the kind myself.

93. Have you, at present, any difficulty i getting persons to compete for the lowest offices —No. I was asked the other day how man applicants were on the list for attachéships, an I found that there were about 22.

94. Was that for one vacancy?—They are a nomination appointments.

95. When a vacancy occurs, what is done?— The Secretary of State appoints from his ow list.

96. How many persons compete for the ap pointment?—There is no competition.

97. It is a nomination, in fact, and there is n competition?—Yes.

98. It is a mere test examination?—Yes, bu it is a very severe test.

99. You have no competition in the Foreig Office?—We have a competition for clerkship but not for diplomacy.

100. I think you have said that the Unite States service is one-third less in cost than th English service?—Yes; according to the tabl that I have put in. In South America, th American diplomatic agents cost them abou 2,800*l.* more than ours do. In Europe they cos about one-third of our heads of missions. Per haps it may interest the Committee to kno that, in the year 1855, the United States nearl doubled their allowances for diplomatic service There is an account in the Report of the Com mittee of 1861. In 1855 the Americans in creased the allowances of their diplomatic servic from about 200,000 dollars to 350,000 dollars year; the American diplomatists were very badl off before. In Peru and Chili the salary of th American minister is higher than our own.

101. Mr. Cartwright.] With reference to th connection between the diplomatic and the con sular service, you have said that it was con sidered a hardship to transfer a person from th consular service to the diplomatic line; can yo state the rule in the French service?—I canno say how often such a transfer is made, but the do transfer, perhaps, more frequently than w do.

102. Is there a greater connection betwee the two services in the French service, than ther is according to the rules of our service?—I d not know whether there is any particular rule i the French service; there is certainly not in ours but, practically, I have known instances o French ministers who have so commenced thei career. I am not quite sure, but I think tha there are several such instances.

103. There is not that professional separatio between the two branches?—There is not quit so much separation. Latterly several minis ters in our diplomatic service have been im ported from the consular service, and there wa a pamphlet published the other day, on behalf o diplomacy generally, very much complaining o it. Of course in a limited service, as ours i any interloper is viewed with disfavour.

104. In the lower grades of the consular ser vice in France, people who pursue the diplomati line oftener begin with those appointment than they do with us?—I am not able to sa that. I have not studied the point sufficientl to speak upon it.

105. I think that you say, that attachés ar changed hanged from post to post after two years?—That is the rule, but sometimes the time is onger.

106. I suppose that, as respects the Persian gation, the case is exceptional?—I will not say hat it is so now, because latterly we have had me second secretaries there, who have stayed or two or three years, and have come away.

107. Were not those persons who are now ttachés originally students?—No. So far as egards the diplomatic service, we only train them p from attachés. With respect to Mr. Thomson nd Mr. Dickson, employed in Persia, they entered the service as paid attachés there, what ve now call second or third secretaries.

108. Then your experience as regards promotion is that you never lose a favourable opportunity, because of the restriction? — There s no restriction. Mr. Thomson, who is in Chili, was secretary of legation in Persia for a ong time. There is nothing to prevent his being moved to another place. The Persian is a very easy language to learn; it does not require the same attention to it as the Turkish language. The Turkish language has been described as consisting alternately of a Persian and an Arabic and a Tartar word.

109. Practically the gentlemen have been there for about 20 years without promotion?—They have had promotion in the mission, and they are tolerably well off. I imagine that their pecuniary position in Persia is very much better than it would have been in other missions.

110. Mr. W. H. Gladstone.] Have you any papers in the Foreign Office which would show the amount of interchange practised under foreign governments between the two services?—I think that everything which we have bearing upon foreign diplomacy will be found in the Appendix to the Report of the Committee of 1861. There is a great deal in the reports of our different ministers, so much so, that in this year it was deemed unnecessary to obtain any further general information.

111. What is the general result; is it that there is a much more frequent interchange?—I cannot say; in foreign services, such interchanges may be more frequent than in ours; there are many motives which operate in foreign countries and not in this country, of which it is very difficult to give an explanation.

112. I understand you to say that if a consul general were promoted to a diplomatic post, there would be considerable jealousy?—I suppose so, but I cannot say positively; it would not come before me in any way, and I certainly should not invite a confidence of the kind. I should have to contend that there was no ground of complaint.

113. Has such a promotion often taken place?—No, it is a very rare thing. Sir Charles Murray was secretary of legation; he served afterwards in Egypt. Admiral Harris began his career in the Consular Department in the Baltic, and then he went, I think, to Chili, which was a diplomatic apppointment. He then went to Berne, and he is now at the Hague. Sir Charles Wyke had been employed in quasi diplomatic services for almost the whole of his career, although he was not what may be called a trained diplomatist. The proof is, that he has received a diplomatic pension. Then there is Sir Rutherford Alcock, whose case is also exceptional. Mr. Matthew, I believe, was secretary of legation; he did not go through the lower grades. The case of Sir Harry Parkes in Japan is also exceptional. Mr. Ward was a consul general and afterwards chargé d'affaires, and minister at the Hans Towns; he has now ceased to be so, in consequence of the political relations of the Hans Towns being merged in the North German Confederation.

114. Is the consul general, although he is not expressly chargé d'affaires, considered a diplomatic officer?—Not unless he has political duties to perform. The application of the Act with regard to diplomatic pensions, has turned upon whether an applicant for a pension had had diplomatic functions to perform. For instance, the consul general in Servia is only consul general; but being principally occupied in diplomatic matters, he would be entitled to a pension by the Act of Parliament as a diplomatic servant.

115. In appointing a person consul general, you would expect him to have certain diplomatic qualifications?—It would depend upon circumstances. With respect to appointing a consul general in the East, I think that the consul general in Servia is almost the only mere consul general whom we have. In certain countries such as Servia and Roumania, Egypt and Tunis, which are dependent on Turkey, we have no diplomatic officers; we have agents and consuls general, who are in an intermediate class between consular and diplomatic officers. An agent and consul general can obtain a pension according to the Act of Parliament under the diplomatic scale, but he would not be generally recognised as a person belonging, strictly speaking, to the diplomatic body, because if he was a recognised member of the diplomatic body, it would by implication amount to recognising the independence of those States.

116. Supposing that a consul general acquitted himself well in the office of consul general, would there be any objection to his having a diplomatic appointment?—Of course there would be no objection to him or to anybody else, but as a general rule I should not say that he would be promoted. It would be very hard, and especially hard now, to appropriate to that class of officers, however meritorious, any of the few posts which should be reserved for those gentlemen who have been trained up in diplomacy. The training now is severe, and I may almost say disheartening, but it is at the same time extremely useful in order to make them efficient public servants. I have very little doubt that, without disparaging the public service at the present day, or our ministers of the present day, against whom I have nothing to say, that as far as advanced abilities are concerned the next generation of diplomatists will, from the training which they have had, be perhaps superior. Some of the secretaries of embassy and legation are most rising and most promising men.

117. Is the standard examination which has to be passed for diplomacy the same as that which has to be passed for the Foreign Office?—It is quite different for the Foreign Office; it is a very slight examination. We require that a person should know sufficient French to copy from dictation; but the only important thing which we do require, and the only thing which I care for in any examination, is the power of making an abstract or precis. A person who can make a good precis is intelligent, and will be a very useful public servant.

Rt. Hon. E. Hammond.

7 March 1870.

118. The examination for diplomacy is much more severe?—Yes; our examination for a clerkship in the office is really very small, but it is adequate to our requirements, because what we most want in the office is steadiness, willingness, and that sort of good feeling about a man which will enable him to associate with his colleagues on friendly terms, and to assist them; and they, in fact, generally do show a zeal and an esprit de corps which is most commendable.

119. There is a competitive examination?—Yes, for the Foreign Office, but not for the diplomatic service; for the latter there is a double examination.

120. Are there often failures in the examination?—There are some failures; but few fail unless under peculiar circumstances; they would generally be allowed another trial.

121. How has the present scale of salaries been fixed; has it not been fixed at different times?—They are occasionally altered. The paper which I just now put into the hands of the Chairman will show what has been the case since 1861, and some of the scales previous to that you will find in Blue Book of 1850; you may have seen the Return which Mr. Rylands moved for, and which was distributed just before Parliament met.

122. Upon the matter of the tradesmen's percentages, do you suppose that the same thing goes on at all in London?—I dare say that it does.

123. Do you think that that is so in London?—I do not know for certain.

124. So far as you know, that practice is not applied particularly to the foreign ministers?—The question has never come before us.

125. Mr. Holms.] Do you know whether those per-centages are also charged to the minister at Washington?—I cannot say that they are charged, but I know that the expense of living at Washington is something enormous; indeed every one of our servants in the United States, including consuls and others, complain of the expense.

126. Do you believe that a minister there is charged more than any other person, merely because he is a minister?—I am only quoting an observation which I have known made, to the effect that there is a diplomatic price and there is a residential price; and I should not be surprised if the tradesmen in Washington were equally alive to their own interests in that respect as those in other parts of the world.

127. You have, I think, stated that the examination for the Foreign Office and the examination for the diplomatic service are different; is it also different for the consular service?—Yes, it is quite different for the consular service.

128. Sir C. W. Dilke.] What is the position of the gentleman who holds the post at Warsaw?—He is consul general. The amount of commercial business at Warsaw I believe is limited, and there is no diplomatic agent. It is essential that the British Government should know what is going on in Poland. There is a consul general there, but his duties of observation and reporting are essentially political.

129. It is, therefore, somewhat an anomalous post; there are not other posts of a similar kind?—I cannot at present recall the case of a post held by a person in the same position as the consul general at Warsaw; we could not put an agent of any other character in Warsaw but a consular one.

130. Do you happen to remember in what countries the language is not learnt by our secretaries and attachés?—We should not insist upon Russian, for instance. We have our second secretary, who, while he belonged to the Foreign Office, picked up a very adequate knowledge of Russian in six months; he picked up afterwards, in China, a very adequate knowledge of Chinese, which is a very difficult language; he then removed to Japan, and after he had been in Japan for a short time he became proficient in the language, and he was made a second secretary attached to the mission in Japan, partly because the mission required one, and partly also in recognition of the zeal and ability that he had shown in that respect; and he is now, I believe, perfectly competent to run alone, without the aid of an interpreter, and to discuss in the language of the country every affair, however important, which may be brought before him.

131. You except Russia, but no other European country?—Yes.

132. Do you except all non-European countries?—No; because in South America a man should pick up Spanish immediately; he should be able to pick it up in six weeks. A man who in this country knows Latin ought to be able to pick up Spanish; the Moorish words in the Spanish language must, of course, be picked up and acquired by practice. Any person who knows Latin can read Spanish, and also Portuguese.

133. In countries where you do not require a knowledge of the language, and where, consequently, you have some person or persons specially attached to the legation or embassy, as the case may be, who speak the language, and who act as interpreters, and do all the work which requires a knowledge of the language, do you take that into consideration in fixing the diplomatic staff?—No; you are now, I presume, alluding to Turkey.

134. I am alluding to Turkey and Russia?—Almost all the diplomacy of Russia is, I believe, conducted in the French language, and, therefore, although it would be very desirable to have a person attached to the mission as the present consul is, who is a perfect master of the Russian language, yet for mere diplomatic purposes, French is everything which is required. The Russian language is used in some of their diplomatic correspondence, but I imagine that, as a general rule, French is the language for diplomatic purposes which is used by the Russians.

135. From whom do you require reports to be sent in from countries where the secretaries do not necessarily know the language; for instance, from Turkey?—The secretary has means of acquiring information, though he cannot speak the language of the country; of course if it was necessary to have a document translated, or if a Turkish paper required to be looked to, the secretary would avail himself of the services of the embassy dragomans.

136. Have you put in a statement of the cost of the American service?—Yes, it is in the tabulated statement.

137. Mr. Cameron.] I think you stated, in answer to a question of the Chairman, that the members of the diplomatic service very much complained of the slowness of promotion; do you consider that that complaint is well founded?—I am very much afraid that it is, because many secretaries have very long standing in the profession without getting promotion.

138. Is the promotion much slower than in the plomatic service of other countries?—That I nnot say.

139. Is a member of our diplomatic service, mpared with foreign diplomatic services, gene- lly a much older man?—It is, I think, stated one of the Papers which I have put in, that at is the case; I am not quite sure that it is ated in one of those Papers, but I have seen it ated in print, within a short time, that it is ther a mortifying position for an English cretary who has grown grey headed in the ser- ce to find that a foreigner, a cotemporary with hom he started, is perhaps a minister, or an bassador, while he himself remains a secre- ry.

140. At the present rate of promotion accord- g to seniority, have you made any calculation how long it would take a man to arrive at the nk of minister?—No; it is so very painful and stressing a subject, that one does not like to nsider it. Take the senior secretary of lega- n at Florence: he became an attaché in 1841, d now we are in 1870; if a mission were vacant might perhaps go there. The next gentleman so became an attaché in 1841. Those are the cretaries of legation, in the grade next but two low that of minister.

141. Is it not the fact that promotion is much wer now than it was when those gentlemen to hom you refer entered the service?—I should y certainly so. Without going very closely to the matter, I should say the promotion must slower, because we have lost five fields of omotion; we have lost the three German mis- ns, and the two Italian missions.

142. Having been so long in the Foreign ffice, do you not consider that the service is lly blocked up?—I cannot deny it; but, at e same time, I think that this might have been ticipated by those who have lately entered into e service. But we have 20 less in the junior ades now than we had in 1861; we had then out 81, and we have now about 61.

143. Can you state how many appointments unpaid attachés have been made since the 1st August?—Six gentlemen have beenappointed cording to this list, which I am told is rrect.

144. Have you any suggestion which you can ake to the Committee to remedy this state of ings, so as to make the service more desirable? No; if the Committee would take into consi- ration the hard position in which these gentle- en are placed, and would recommend that the rvice should be made more of a scale service, should be very glad; by that I mean, that ter a certain number of years' service their laries should be increased; that might be a on to them; it is a boon which is now enjoyed the secretaries of legation. By a rule laid wn by Mr. Secretary Canning, a secretary of gation, after 10 years' service as such, is titled to an additional allowance of 250*l.* a ar, and you will find an asterisk in the Esti- ates to mark those gentlemen who have that ditional allowance of 250*l.* a year; that is the ly boon granted for length of service to the nior members of diplomacy; and I really think at it would be an act of justice to them if the mmittee would recommend, and if Parliament uld sanction, any scheme by which that prin- ple should be extended, and that after a certain ngth of service an additional allowance should be 0.51.

made to those gentlemen who had failed in obtaining their promotion; it would be only applying to the diplomatic service what was the case in the Foreign Office before I came into it (and I believe in all other offices), namely, that instead of the classification which now exists, advancement in a pecuniary point of view went by length of service, and not by seniority. It has happened in the Foreign Office, limited as the Foreign Office is, that a clerk has reached the head of his class, having got to his maximum, and there remained for many years; perhaps it is not frequent at the present moment, but I have known it to happen most severely within my own memory in the Foreign Office.

145. That might be a boon to individual members of the service, but it would hardly relieve the profession of men who were anxious to get on?—No; but it would be an alleviation of the hardship, which men have now to undergo, of spending, for a long series of years, so much more money than they receive, which some now do. Third secretaries have a mere salary of 150*l.* a year, while they are liable to be sent to places at which they must spend a much larger amount. If a man is sent to St. Petersburg, I believe that he may reckon that he cannot live upon less than 800*l.* a year. The difference between the life of a clerk in London, and the life of an attaché abroad, is this, that a clerk in London may live very respectably in lodgings of moderate rental; if he is a prudent man, he may dine at his club or chambers; at all events he may dine very well at his club now for 2*s.* or 3*s.* a day; but he cannot do that abroad. In England he may live in inexpensive lodgings, he wants no servant, and he keeps no carriage; but at St. Petersburg, and in any foreign country, a man can hardly do without his servant, and in St. Petersburg I believe that he can hardly do without some vehicle. Now that is a great hardship to a man, and it would, unquestionably, be a very great boon if the Committee would take that point into consideration, and assist him to some graduated scale of addition to his salary. It is now utterly impossible for a man of moderate means to go into the diplomatic service; at least it is the height of imprudence to do so. The judgment which I have formed from long observation, and from what I have heard from others, and from what I have seen in reports, is that no father would act prudently in putting his son into the diplomatic profession, unless, from the day when he entered that profession as an unpaid attaché, he was prepared to allow him 500*l.* a year. That, I think, is the minimum. I do not mean to say that in every place he would have to spend 500*l.* a year; at Stockholm, and at Copenhagen, he might not have to spend that amount, but you cannot regulate the distribution of the junior members of the diplomatic profession among the missions with reference to their means; they must take their turn with the rest. It would be very hard always to leave a man at an expensive place, supposing that his means did not admit of it; therefore, all gentlemen must be prepared to take their turn, and it is a very severe matter for those who have not the means of meeting the expense of doing so. There was a very excellent Minute issued by the Treasury some time ago, which laid down the principle that a man in embarrassed circumstances could not be a good public servant. Now, the effect of the present system is, that the younger members of the diplomatic service, unless they have a sufficient allowance from their families, must be in embarrassed circumstances, and cannot meet their expenses. That really is a consideration. In looking at the interests of the diplomatic service, which this Committee is appointed to consider, you may not be able to devise means for providing promotion for these men, but I think that you might assist them by supplying them with means to meet their necessary expenses, The work of the diplomatic service has, like the work of all other services, immensely increased within my memory. I had a return made to me recently, which, if the Chairman will allow me, I will put in, as showing the amount in the different countries of the diplomatic correspondence in the last 10 years, that is to say, the bound volumes of the diplomatic correspondence. It illustrates the amount of work in the different missions. Another test which we could apply to the amount of work, is a test which we have been in the habit of keeping in the Foreign Office for many years past, and which is also an index to the work of our missions abroad; namely, the number of papers which have been received in and sent from the Foreign Office in the last 44 years (the Witness delivered in a Paper). That is a paper which shows as well as anything else, and better than words could describe, the increased amount of business which the officers under the control of the Foreign Office are called upon to discharge.

146. Chairman.] This paper, I suppose, does not include telegrams?—It includes every entry in our diaries.

147. Does it include letters and telegrams?—Yes. In 1825 there were 12,000 entries, and in 1869 there were 51,000 entries. It includes everything which is entered in our day's journal. The practice of our office is that every paper coming into the office is entered in a diary, and every letter which goes out is entered in a diary, and that is the sum total of each particular year.

148. Mr. Cameron.] Do you think that it would be possible, without injury to the public service, to employ in place of the regular secretaries and attachés, clerks at a much lower salary to do the part of the work which is called routine work, and which does not require any great amount of confidential habits on the part of the members of the diplomatic service?—I think that such a principle would be utterly ruinous, and the reason is this: in the first place it would not be economical, because if you send an Englishman to any foreign country to act as a copying clerk, you would have to give him at the outset of his career much more than 150*l.* a year to enable him to live there. You now get your attaché for nothing, and you get your third secretary for 150*l.* a year. The next reason is, that nothing is so destructive to the harmony of an office, and still more so in the limited sphere of a mission where you have only four or five members, as to have a difference between the social classes of men. The practical working of such a plan would be, that as every person likes to get the work off his own shoulders, as far as he can, those people would be employed on other than the work for which they were engaged. That would be very inconvenient, considering the character of a great part of the business which is carried on in a mission. Then there is another point of view; you require a certain staff to meet the pressure of confidential business; at Paris, indeed, the pressure comes continually, from day to day; on some days it is more, and on some days it is less. At Berlin it may be perhaps twice or three times a week, and at St. Petersburg and Vienna it is just the same. For the work which is required to be done on those days, you want unquestionably confidential officers; they are fully pressed to do it, but the pressure perhaps does not extend over more than two or three days in the week, and unless those persons also had the current business, and what is called the routine business, to occupy their time when not engaged in confidential business, they would be in idleness. Now, I do not think that it is good for any public servant to have three or nearly four days idle in the week; it is much better that he should be employed, whether on important, or whether on trifling business, and the only effect of appointing clerks to do this business would be that you must have a double staff, and that you would have your business done badly. The same point has been very much discussed with regard to the Civil Service of this country. There is no ambassador (taking the highest grades), and indeed no person in the Civil Service generally, who is the worse for routine training; in fact no ambassador or other superior officer can get his work properly done unless he knows how it should be done, and he can only acquire that knowledge by having worked through all the details. It is the same thing with respect to the clerks in the Foreign Office. It would be destructive to the Foreign Office to import into it a different class of clerks. All our clerks are constantly called upon to deal with the business generally, whatever may be its character. There is the greatest confidence placed in them, but at the same time pressure of confidential business does not occupy a clerk's whole time, although a sufficient number must be ready to do it. Now I will mention a case which happened only on last Saturday night. I left the office at seven o'clock on Saturday night, and I left six of the clerks, and they told me that they must stay till 12 o'clock. They were engaged on business which could only be done by skilled labour, but luckily for them they did get their business over by great exertion earlier than 12 o'clock. At the Foreign Office and at the embassies you must be ready with persons, whether they be secretaries or clerks, to meet any pressure of confidential business, and it would be mischievous if, when that pressure was passed, those people had nothing to do. I am glad to have an opportunity of saying that, because it is a thing which I think should be borne very much in mind in dealing with the Civil Service generally that distinction which is sought to be drawn between the intellectual and the mechanical part of official work is wrong in principle, if sought to be applied indiscriminately to all offices, and it is expensive in itself and tends very much to impair the future efficiency of the service. I perhaps may be allowed to say that, in a comparison instituted the other day as to the relative expense of copying clerks and the clerks on our establishment, I found that the expense for fifteen junior clerks on one establishment, who would be useful to us at all times, whether present or future, from the training which they have got, and who are necessary for all current business, and with whom we could not dispense, was 500 l. or 700 l. a year less than the same number of copying clerks in the office of one of the other Secretaries of State.

149. You do not use copying machines?—No; I refer to copying clerks; a machine is quite out of the question.

150. Mr. Frederick Walpole.] I think that you stated that you regretted very much that Lord Clarendon's scheme for having in each embassy a student attaché, fell through?—It was Lord Palmerston's scheme, but it was only intended to apply it to Turkey.

151. Do you not think that it would be very much for the benefit of the service if that scheme was carried out?—The truth of the matter is, that I am so disheartened by the failure of that scheme, that I should be very sorry again to attempt an experiment of that kind in Turkey; but we have tried it in China with eminent success.

152. And in Persia?—I put Persia out of the question; most of the gentlemen in Persia have, I believe, picked up the language there, but we never had any students in Persia.

153. But you are decidedly in favour of the scheme if it could be carried out?—I do not now think it necessary to repeat that experiment; when the experiment was undertaken, I think in 1840, we were then dependent entirely upon the dragomans for the transaction of all our business with the Porte. We must always have a certain number of dragomans for the peculiar business which they have to perform, but I should think that it would be an unnecessary expense now to revert to that system, which I certainly was very strongly in favour of, and, in fact, I believe that I myself recommended it to Lord Palmerston. That scheme, if it had succeeded, I should have carried out very much in accordance with the view which, I believe, his Lordship entertained; and I should have proposed to make it an establishment like the Foreign Office, namely, that those gentlemen who had been appointed to Constantinople and the East should look to that as their future career, in the same manner as the gentlemen who are appointed to the Foreign Office look to it as their future career. I would have made a classification of them, and I would have laid it down, that after so many years they should receive an increase of salary, and after so many years they should receive a further increase of salary, so as to make it worth their while to remain at Constantinople, and not seek their fortunes elsewhere, in the same manner as the clerks in most Government offices are content to seek their fortunes in the office in which they are originally employed. That was the scheme which floated through my mind when that plan was first in agitation; it fell through, for reasons which I would rather not say anything about; and I confess that I think that the result of that scheme is so disheartening, that, even though good might result from it, I could not recommend another attempt to be made.

154. Mr. Kinnaird.] You have said that the principle of seniority obtains, generally speaking, in the office?—Yes, up to the post of secretary of legation.

155. But following up what Mr. Cameron has inquired into, it appears that there are some very remarkable instances; for example, there is Mr. Barnard, who entered the service in 1816, and he has been for 22 years at Coburg?—Yes.

156. Then there is the case of Mr. Thomson, who has been for 22 years at Teheran?—Yes.

157. It must be exceedingly discouraging to the service to have to serve in a bad climate for 22 years?—Mr. Barnard, I think, preferred to remain at Coburg. I have known Mr. Barnard for a long time; my impression has always been that Mr. Barnard had no wish to remove from the post where he is; he is very comfortable there.

158. I am asking the question on public grounds; if since 1816 Mr. Barnard has remained in that position, is it not a great discouragement to the junior members of the service?—No; because you must have somebody there, and the junior members of the service would not gain if Mr. Barnard took a mission which, if he did not take, a person junior to him would take.

159. It prevents a person who is in an unhealthy climate going to Coburg; is there no remedy for the block which exists in the service?—I do not consider that Mr. Barnard has been the cause of blocking the service.

160. In answer to Mr. Cameron, you admitted that there was a block in the service?—Yes; but I think that the block in the service arises from this circumstance: we have a numerous body of juniors, with a very small body of seniors, whereas in former times there were five more missions than now, and five secretaryships, and those missions and those secretaryships are abolished; those are the blocks which I alluded to. I do not consider that Mr. Barnard is a block at all.

161. On the contrary, I see that there is Mr. Robert Grant Watson, who has only been 10 years in the service, and he is now secretary of legation at Athens; that is very rapid promotion; how could that happen in a seniority service?—Because he arrived at the top of the list of attachés; if you will take that list, you will see that the first second secretary was Mr. Lionel Moore, and that the next second secretary was Mr. Watson. I should say that Mr. Watson was transferred to us from the Indian service. In 1858, when the mission was transferred for a time from the Foreign Office to the India Office, Mr. Watson, who was then a captain, or a lieutenant, in the Indian service, was appointed by them to the Persian Mission, and we took him over when the mission was retransferred to the Foreign Office.

The Right Honourable EDMUND HAMMOND; further Examined.

Rt. Hon. E. Hammond.
10 March 1870.

162. Mr. Kinnaird.] WHEN you were interrupted on the last occasion, I was asking for an explanation with respect to the block in the service; I understand that another Member will examine you upon that point?—I believe that the questions and answers in the evidence, with a little correction, represent very closely what passed.

163. You do not wish to say anything in continuation of your evidence with regard to the block in the service?—I should be glad to say that Mr. Barnard's stay at Coburg has been practically no injury. In the first place, if you look at the Red Book, you will find that every ambassador, minister, chargé d'affaires, and secretary of an embassy, who is now in the service, and who went through the grade of secretary of legation, was made secretary of legation subsequently to Mr. Barnard, and therefore the position of Mr. Barnard at Coburg has not prevented people going over his head. In the second place, I wish to explain that Mr. Barnard's proper salary at Coburg is 400 l. a year, and with two exceptions, every one of our secretaries of legation cannot be a loser in the amount of his salary by Mr. Barnard being at Coburg. Until the mission at Dresden was broken up, Mr. Barnard was secretary of legation at Dresden; he belonged to the Dresden mission, but resided at Coburg. In the returns you will see Mr. Barnard's name put down with a salary of 650 l. a year, but you will see an asterisk to that figure in the Estimates, showing that Mr. Barnard, having served 10 years as secretary of legation, has come under the provision of Mr. Secretary Canning's regulation, and obtained the 250 l. extra for long service. No other gentleman who took the post at Dresden would receive that 250 l. a year; he would go upon a salary of 400 l. a year, and would not have the 250 l. a year until he too had served 10 years as secretary of legation. But an active man, and one who really wished to rise in his profession, would wish to take a more active position than that at Coburg would be. Therefore, practically, Mr. Barnard is an injury to nobody, and I think that he has always been very happy to be at Coburg, and has not wished to be removed. I have never passed a word upon the subject with him, but I believe that to be the case.

164. Can you state what are the advantages to the public of keeping up an expensive mission at Coburg; I suppose that it is not for trade purposes, or anything in a commercial point of view, that it is essential?—Coburg is a particular position; and with respect to that, and one or two other questions which I anticipated would be asked, I thought it more respectful to the Committee to put down my answers upon paper, in order that they might be well considered; and if the Committee will allow me I will read this paper as my answer:—Since the year 1841 the secretary of legation belonging to the Dresden mission has always resided at Coburg as chargé d'affaires, and I believe did so occasionally before that time without that character. The ground of his residence there was the near connection between the Queen and the Ducal family, which connection still subsists with this additional bond, that Her Majesty's second son will succeed the present Duke; and the change in the political status of Germany affords no valid reason for setting aside an arrangement, the grounds on which it was made remaining not only unimpaired, but strengthened by the relation in which the Queen's second son stands towards the ruling family in the Duchy. The cost of maintaining the secretary of legation and chargé d'affaires amounts in the aggregate to not more than 850 l. a year, which is the sum of his allowance.

165. Under the change of affairs in Germany, do you think that it is desirable to keep up so many persons at the embassy at Dresden and Darmstadt; they are three rather expensive missions. Can you state what are the benefits which are derived by the state in general. You know that various new countries have been developed, and that there are new outlets of trade; would they not be more usefully represented by this country?—On the same ground that I took a note a note with regard to Coburg, I have done so as to Dresden, but I am perfectly ready to answer any other questions which any Member of the Committee may put upon the subject. You may say that this is the ground upon which the chargé d'affaires at Dresden is now maintained. The misfortunes of the Royal House of Saxony have excited great sympathy throughout Europe, and, as a proof of this, all the Great Powers continue to maintain full missions at Dresden, as England would also, in all probability, have done, if it had not happened that the British Mission was vacant when the change in North German affairs, consequent on the Treaty of Prague, took effect. The British Mission was not then filled up; but the absence of any diplomatic representative at the Saxon Court, on the part of England alone, of all the Great Powers, was painfully felt by the Royal Family of Saxony, who looked upon it as an indication of indifference to its fate, and it was more keenly felt when the family connection subsisting between the Queen and the House of Saxony was borne in mind. Besides this, the large British colony at Dresden, who had always enjoyed the advantage of the presence of diplomatic representatives of their country, felt it to be a great hardship to be deprived altogether of a representative, and to be forced to repair to the consular office at Leipsic for various acts of formal assistance, which could only be rendered by a British agent. But, even so, they were left without any national protection on the spot. On all these grounds, it was determined to place a diplomatic agent of the lowest rank at Dresden, whose allowances as secretary of legation and chargé d'affaires amount in the aggregate to 950*l.* a year.

166. Have you prepared a paper as to Darmstadt?—Yes; I have a little scruple in making this statement, because it rather trenches on what a person in my situation ought not to say; but still I hope that it will not give offence to anybody. The near vicinity of Darmstadt to the Prussian frontier, and its territorial sovereignty over one of the most important fortresses on the Rhine, now occupied by a Prussian garrison, invest it with a certain degree of political importance not attaching to Dresden or Coburg; and the fact that France and Prussia, Austria and Russia, besides other powers, keep up Ministers in Darmstadt, may be cited as a proof that in their estimation the place is far from unimportant, especially now, when there is no longer a diplomatic body established at Frankfort. But besides this, the Queen's daughter being established at Darmstadt, her husband being close in succession to the Duchy, it would have an unseemly appearance in the eyes of Europe, if Her Majesty alone, of all the principal powers, refrained from showing that respect to the Grand Ducal House which is evinced by the maintenance of a diplomatic representative at the capital; but that representative is not even a chargé d'affaires, but holds merely the rank of secretary of legation, and the aggregate amount of cost entailed for his allowances is 700*l.* a year.

167. Do the same reasons appertain to Stuttgardt?—There are reasons which I have some little embarrassment in stating, considering the official position which I hold, but I have no hesitation in saying that the political interests of the country are benefited by the presence of a Minister at Stuttgardt. In former times there was a mission established at Frankfort, which was the seat of the Germanic Confederation, where all the members of the Germanic body were represented; and therefore through that mission we had the means of ascertaining pretty correctly the feelings of the different courts of Germany specifically as regarded German affairs, but of course not very distinctly as regarded general affairs. That mission is abolished; but I think that any person who considers the state of Germany, and what hinges on Germany, would come to the conclusion that it is not unimportant for the British Government to have full acquaintance with everything which goes on in those German courts, which are still unincorporated with Prussia, so as to know their feelings and tendencies, because their feelings and tendencies may have a most important effect upon the general politics of Europe; and I think that it would be extremely imprudent to deprive the British Government of the opportunity of gaining a correct knowledge of the feelings in Wurtemburg and Baden (because the Wurtemburg Mission also comprises Baden). I think that the amalgamation of those missions with the other larger South German Mission, namely, Bavaria, would not be expedient, because, though in some respects their interests are the same, they may be in other respects divergent, and a Minister going from one court to another, when the opinions of the two courts are divergent in some respects, may be looked upon with a certain degree of suspicion, and not treated in both on the same terms of confidential intercourse, which it is desirable for the purpose for which the mission is appointed that he should be. There is another reason, which is a thing perfectly within my own knowledge, namely, that at a small court, an intimation is frequently obtained of transactions which are likely to occur in Europe, and which may very materially affect the general interests of Europe. In one particular instance, namely, at the commencement of the Austrian war against Italy, the certainty that the war was about to begin was first obtained at a small German court; those are the grounds upon which I venture to say that I think that it would be imprudent to abolish the Stuttgardt Mission; it would be only a partial economy, because we should be certain to keep up, if not a Minister, a chargé d'affaires there. At a court like that we could not give our chargé d'affaires less than 1,000*l.* or 1,200*l.* a year, and 200*l.* a year for house rent, and we should have to give the present Minister 900*l.* a year pension, and therefore the saving would be exceedingly small.

168. You are glad of the opportunity of bringing the matter before the Committee?—Yes; I know that there is a very strong feeling about it, and I thought that the Committee should know exactly the real facts and bearings of the subject; and I can refer in support of the principle of what I now state to a much higher authority than myself. If any gentleman will turn to the evidence of Lord Palmerston before the Official Salaries Committee in 1850 (Question No. 607), I think that he will find what I have now said confirmed by Lord Palmerston, and the ground on which his Lordship maintained it is very much strengthened by present circumstances.

169. Prussia would not look with jealousy upon a Minister at Dresden as interfering with the court at Berlin?—With respect to Dresden, Prussia herself maintains a diplomatic mission in Saxony, as she did before; it is a peculiar relation between Saxony and the German Confederation; all the other nations are absolutely included in the North German Confederation, but Saxony has reserved to herself the privilege of appointing Ministers to foreign states, though those Ministers are avowedly in their diplomatic connection subordinate to the general interests of the North German Confederation. We must remember what Saxony is, and the position which Saxony occupies. Saxony stands between two great empires, and she has been quasi mediatised for two or three years, as in the great Continental War other states were absorbed or mediatised, but on the re-settlement of Europe those states were resuscitated, and no person can venture to say that at some day or another Saxony will not be resuscitated. In a strategical point of view, it is in a very important position. The gorges of the Saxon hills have often affected a battle field, and may do so hereafter; therefore I think that there are considerations which should make it very desirable that some connection should be maintained between the British and the Saxon Courts, because nothing can happen in that quarter without a general tendency to re-act upon ourselves. I hope that I may be allowed to say that a commotion in Europe, though we may keep out of it, would affect our interests most materially; there can be no complication in Europe of a serious character which would not re-act upon our whole manufacturing population, who are to a considerable extent dependent upon our free intercourse with the Continent for their livelihood and their wealth, and of course anything which tends to deprive them of any portion of their industrial resources must act very injuriously upon them. Therefore it is that the interests of Great Britain on the Continent are not to be measured by what you may call the warlike propensities of the country, but by the industrial propensities of the country. As an illustration of that, I cite the instance of the civil war in America. We know too well the bearing of that war on our industrial population; we know that it crippled and ruined the whole of our cotton population. That is an illustration of the effect which a Continental convulsion would have upon our industry at home.

170. We were informed in the House of Commons the other night, in answer to a question, that the Foreign Office agencies were to cease on the 30th of November next, that date having been fixed to make different arrangements; can you state what those arrangements are likely to be?—The Foreign Office agencies will cease on the 30th of November, in obedience to the wish which was expressed in the House of Commons. I am afraid that our consular and diplomatic service will suffer very much by it. There were certain things to be borne in mind, and the first was, how these gentlemen were to get their salaries which they had received through their agents. Now, it is very easy to say that they could get them through their bankers, but no banker would undertake the business of a client who was not able to leave a certain amount of balance in his hand; in fact, it has indirectly come to my knowledge that overtures made by persons, unconnected with the office, to adopt the business upon the cessation of the Foreign Office agency, required that parties should keep in their hands a balance of 150*l.* Now, when I tell the Committee that in our diplomatic and consular services there are above 200 persons who are not in the receipt of 600*l.* a year, I think that they will agree with me that those persons could hardly be expected to be able to keep a balance of 150*l.* always in their agents' hands. Therefore we are obliged to have resort to an expedient (if the Treasury will sanction it) by which those gentlemen who are not able to obtain, or desirous of obtaining, their salaries by giving a power of attorney to a banker or agent in London, may draw upon the chief clerk at the expiration of the quarter. That proposal is still before the Treasury and we have not received an answer to it. There was another point to be considered, which was entirely in the interests of our diplomatic service and in the interests of the consuls, namely, that heretofore they have always had the privilege of receiving and forwarding their letters under the cover of the official seal; it saved their postage, and it was a protection to their correspondence. That of course was done for them by the agents in the office; but when the agents are abolished, no machinery at present exists in the office to supply their place. Therefore, we have proposed to the Treasury to allow us two postal clerks who would attend to that business, and to that business alone, having nothing to do in the shape of agency. In fact as long as I am in office, if the Treasury assent, I should take very good care to prevent communication on private matters of the character of agency passing between them and the persons whose letters they forward. Now, if the Committee will bear with me, I will read the letter to the Treasury. It is scarcely in an official shape, so that I can put it in, but I can read it in evidence.

171. Chairman.] That is an unanswered letter?—Yes, but I will put it in.

172. Mr. Kinnaird.] Am I to understand from what you have said, that the clerks who have hitherto acted as agents look for any compensation for the loss which you say that they have sustained?—They naturally hope for compensation, but I am sorry to say that at present they have no assured ground that they will receive compensation.

173. How long has the system gone on?—From before the year 1786.

174. In your own opinion, they are entitled to compensation?—Yes. Perhaps I may be allowed to read this part of the letter to the Treasury. This is a letter written by me under the direction of Lord Clarendon, to the Secretary of the Treasury. It says, "Nevertheless Lord Clarendon feels it due to persons connected with this office, and in whom, as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, he takes a warm interest, to express his decided opinion that such compensation is fairly due to them, and cannot be withheld on any ground of justice, or without setting aside the deliberate opinion of the House of Commons and of the Board of Treasury in analogous cases in which compensation has been admitted to be due." Those cases are stated at length in a memorandum which I will put in from the agents; but one of them is so very remarkable that perhaps I may be allowed to allude to it in my evidence. There is a case with which the House of Commons were concerned, which is so strictly parallel that it may be called identical. This case to which the agents would beg to be allowed to refer s a precedent, which should govern their use, is that of the clerks of the House of Commons, who, up to the year 1836, were ermitted to act as "private agents" for oliciting and passing Bills through Parliament. In 1833 a Committee of the House f Commons was appointed to inquire into the fees, salaries, and emoluments received by officers and public servants of that House, and the ees, charges, and expenses of passing Bills hrough Parliament," and the question of the employment of the officers of the House in private 'arliamentary business, or, as they were called n subsequent reports, "private agents," was fully nquired into by that Committee, which made heir report in August; and after saying that the ystem should be put an end to, they go on to ay, "in taking into consideration the different offices, and the salaries and emoluments attached o them, the Committee felt themselves bound, n justness and fairness to a very laborious and meritorious body of clerks, and by the rule recognised in numerous instances by The House, and observed in all public departments, on the abolition or regulation of any office, to pay due regard to existing interests;" and although they recommended an immediate and general revision and alteration both of the offices and emoluments attached to them, they stated that they did so "with the full intention that such compensation should be made to the persons who might be thereby affected as might be consistent with the circumstances of each individual case." Another Committee sat afterwards, and the matter ended by compensation being granted to the clerks of the House of Commons engaged in private business, in which they had been permitted to engage. There is one other passage, which I will read, in which Lord Clarendon says that the result of inquiries "shows that, with very few exceptions, there is no desire, but, on the contrary, a general feeling of regret, on the part of Her Majesty's diplomatic and consular servants, that a system should be abolished which had contributed very greatly to their personal convenience, which cost the public nothing to maintain, and which did not lead to the abuse which has been erroneously imputed to it, of enabling the agents to exercise influence on appointments, or promotions, to the advantage or prejudice of members of either service."

175. Mr. Eastwick.] The examinations first instituted, by Lord Clarendon, on the 1st of January 1856, were, six years afterwards, made more stringent on the Report of the Committee of 1861, and I think that you expressed yourself, in answer to Question 35, as not being dissatisfied with the results of that greater stringency?—I am perfectly satisfied with those results, so far as time has been given to ascertain them. The gentlemen who have come in to the public service since those examinations were established are a very promising class of public servants.

176. There are now two examinations, and in answer to Question 14, you stated that an attaché must pass his second examination in order to obtain the position of third secretary?—That was a misapprehension on my part. I was rather confused. The examinations have been altered two or three times, and I got rather confused, but in my corrected evidence I have put it right. The Foreign Office list is right; it was a misapprehension on my part as to the arrangements about those examinations.

177. In order to pass the second examination, a junior diplomatic officer must return to England, perhaps, from South America: to avoid that inconvenience, would it not be better to have a full examination on admission into the service, or, at all events, at the end of the six months which must be passed in the Foreign Office?—That was the rule partially laid down in the first regulations; the rule was, that the candidate might, at his option, either undergo one examination at the end of six months, or might undergo two examinations. In the first instance he was allowed six months to prepare, and in the second instance only three months. Where two examinations were to take place, the first examination was more limited than it would be if there was only one examination. Great inconvenience was found to result from that regulation, because, practically, taking the length of time that a man required to prepare himself, which was six months, and it was frequently requested to be extended a little, you could hardly refuse a man who begged for another month, and allowing for some relaxation before he commenced attendance in the office, an attaché was not available for the public service abroad for more than a year after his nomination. That was found inconvenient, and it was changed by Lord Russell in 1865. It was merely done for departmental convenience, in order not to keep the attachés too long from their proper duties abroad, when they were first appointed. The change also had this advantage, that the attachés would come to their second examination, in some respects, better prepared as regards languages, and also would be able to do that upon which a great stress was laid, namely, to place before the examiners a report on the countries in which they had resided, showing thereby their power of observation and their general capacity.

178. I understand that you are not dissatisfied with the system of examination for the clerkships in the Foreign Office?—Not in the least.

179. But that is a modified competitive examination?—It is; three persons are named, and the person who gets the greatest number of marks, supposing that he comes up to the standard which the Civil Service Commissioners have fixed (and of which we know nothing), will have his appointment as a matter of course.

180. You stated before the Committee of 1861, that you thought that, for the general benefit of the diplomatic service, no man ought to enter the profession until he had taken his degree at a University, or certainly until he had fairly gone through a public school, and that that was the best training for a man to acquire a knowledge of the world, and tact; do you still entertain that opinion?—Yes, most strongly.

181. In 1841 Lord Palmerston gave two diplomatic appointments to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and Lord Strangford and Mr. Doria were nominated to fill them; in 1845, Lord Aberdeen did the same, and, I believe, Mr. Almeric Wood and Mr. Hughes obtained those appointments?—I think so.

182. Your answer to Question 49 seems to imply that Mr. Alison was one of the four, but he was appointed in 1838, and was never at an English university; will you correct your statement?—That was a misapprehension on my part. Mr. Alison was appointed before the system was inaugurated of appointing young men from the universities, but he was appointed on the same principle for studying the language. At the time when Mr. Alison was appointed, I believe that he was nephew, or some near relation, to the Consul General in Albania, and he had acquired considerable proficiency in the language of the East, and was therefore a very suitable person to inaugurate a system which Lord Palmerston for a long time had very much desired to establish, namely, one which would supply the Embassy at Constantinople with the means of interpretation by Englishmen.

10 March 1870.

183. He was not from an English university? —No; after the appointment of Mr. Alison to Constantinople, the system seemed promising, and Lord Palmerston determined to extend it still further, and if possible to reduce it to a general system.

184. You have stated, in your evidence before the Committee of 1861, that you consider a very strict property qualification desirable for admission into the diplomatic service; would not that be unnecessary if junior members received 250 l. a-year in cash, and were allowed a free table?—No, it would not; but as a question of public expense it would come very much to allowing a man a salary of 500 l. a-year. I do not think that the Foreign Office is prepared to recommend that an attaché, or even a second secretary, after a few years' probation, should be placed upon a salary of 500 l. a year; that is a large sum. When you say a free table, it is but a small portion of an attaché's expense. He has his house-rent to pay, and his servant to provide, and perhaps a carriage. Those things a young man may do without in England, assuming that he is living in lodgings in London, but he cannot do without them abroad; he has not the same facilities of getting attendance abroad as he has here, and in the position which a member of the diplomatic body occupies abroad, it would be scarcely consistent with his general intercourse with society to be placed in an inferior position to that of those parties with whom he is in daily intercourse. I am afraid that that property qualification which I have stated, is indispensably necessary, because I know that it was only the other day that we received a strong representation, supported by his minister, from one of our secretaries of legation, who was then receiving a salary of 500 l. a-year, of the impossibility of his maintaining himself upon that amount. That is in a country where there should be no competition for position. A young man entering the profession must take his chance of the place where he resides; he may reside and live cheaply enough perhaps at a small court, but even for the public interest, as a public servant, he must in succession go to large courts, and in the large courts the expense, I am sorry to say, cannot fall short of, and I believe in most instances it very much exceeds, what I have put down as the minimum expenditure. But I would refer you to the collection of Papers which I placed in the hands of the Chairman on the first sitting of the Committee, in which the expense which a young man attached to a mission can scarcely avoid incurring on the lowest scale, is fully stated. I believe that it is stated in regard to every mission, but certainly as regards the principal ones.

185. Does not it come to this, that in point of fact under the present system a person can hardly be said to have a property qualification, because it appears that the junior members in the establishment at present are not able to live upon their allowances; if they had private property there would not be the same difficulty: with regard to what you have stated with respect to keeping 150 l. in the hands of a banker, of course if a man was possessed of property, there would be no difficulty in that respect?—I am speaking of Foreign Office clerks; the greater number of them have families, and are residing in London.

186. I am speaking rather of the diplomatic officers? — Our diplomatists do not live in London.

187. I really must press this question; you have stated that there is rather a difficulty now that the agencies are to be done away with, inasmuch as some, I think you stated 200 of the diplomatic and consular officers abroad would find it inconvenient to keep 150 l. in their bankers' hands; supposing that they were really men of property, and that this property qualification, which you say is so necessary, were enforced, there would be no difficulty in that respect?—No; but I am afraid that the great majority of our attachés and secretaries of legation are not men of that property which would enable them to keep a standing balance in their bankers' hands. I take it that their salaries are generally spent from quarter to quarter. I am afraid so, although I have no personal knowledge of it.

188. You stated, in your evidence before the Committee of 1861, that your principal objection to opening the diplomatic service to competition was, that you must have people qualified by their social condition in this country to enter the best society abroad. The gentlemen who came from the Universities in 1841 and 1845 were so qualified, were they not?—I suppose so.

189. Supposing that the property qualification was rendered unnecessary in the manner which I have indicated, can you give any definite reasons why the appointments to the diplomatic service should not be thrown open to the Universities for competition, supposing that there was an allowance, say, of 250 l. a year, and that there were other allowances? — I should think that it would be desirable that the Secretary of State should have the means of knowing something of a person whom he appointed to the diplomatic service, and of his private life; you, I presume, suggest that such appointments should be thrown open to the Universities. That is one reason; but, in the next place, I think that the prize of the diplomatic service would not attract members of the University generally. I talked to a person connected with Oxford life, some time ago, and I was told that the Universities now hold out such great pecuniary advantages for people who have cast in their lot at the Universities, that a clever man would very much hesitate whether he should forego those prospects, and go abroad into what, even at the best, is a very unpromising profession; it is a very pleasant profession, but 500 l. a year would not suffice for a man abroad in all foreign Courts; he could not live upon it, and I believe that very few diplomatists can live, even in the highest grades, upon the salaries which are allotted to them. It is a very expensive profession, and I think that most parents, except those in affluent circumstances, ought to hesitate about putting a son into it; I know that I would not put a son of my own into it.

190. In

190. In one case which has been tried, the ervice obtained a man of most remarkable ilities, and a man of high position; I mean rd Strangford?—That was certainly the case, t it was for a special service; he was appointed a special place, with no prospect held out of ing elsewhere. The object of interpreting tachés was, that they should be permanently tached to the embassy at Constantinople. We ve them a salary at the commencement, and e lodged them; we increased their salary afterards, but we had not time to develope the system hich was then inaugurated. I myself believe at we should have found it necessary (and I now from something within my own knowledge, at we should have found it necessary) to very gely increase the salaries of interpreting ttachés if we wished to keep those gentlemen ermanently with us. There is a certain analogy another part of the world as regards some of ir servants, and we have lost valuable servants consequence of their being attracted from our ervice by greater pecuniary inducements than e could hold out to them. After all, it really omes to a matter of expenditure; if the House f Commons are content to open the public purse, nd to give the members of the diplomatic ervice as much as they require to spend in rder to keep up the position which they have to ccupy, you may then do away with what I call he property qualification; and when I say that hey must keep up the position which they ccupy, I wish to be understood as saying that t is of great importance to the public service hat a junior member of a mission should move bout in the first society of the place in which he esides; it is there that information is obtained f what is going on in the country, and also in ther countries, and that is one of the great uses o a minister of the junior members of the service; they ought to be to the minister what Lord Palmerston said the smaller missions were o the country, his eyes and his ears, and they ught to keep him fully informed of everything hich comes under their observation in society.

191. Supposing that the appointments were hrown open to competition at the Universities, would you not be just as likely, as, under the resent system, to get men of great powers of bservation, and with agreeable manners, and uickness of intellect, which you stated in your examination before the Committee of 1861 to be he chief qualifications required for the diplomatic ervice?—The answer to that question is, Can a ompetitive examination determine anything but he educational qualifications of a man? I believe that it cannot.

192. You have already stated that you think hat a University education ensures certain qualifications, and a knowledge of the world?—Yes; it ensures a knowledge of the world, but many men have a knowledge of the world who do not exactly know how to use that knowledge.

193. Do you consider those qualifications of more importance than linguistic attainments, argumentative powers, general information, and high moral character?—With respect to acquirements of a high moral character, I would ask how are you to ascertain them by a competitive examination? Possibly some of the best men in the University in point of learning would have a difficulty in establishing possession of high moral character by a competitive examination.

194. The fact of a man having passed three years in the University, and of his taking a high degree, would be to a certain extent a test of his moral character?—It is not a test on which you can rel ; I believe that these questions refer to questions put by Mr. George Hope in 1861. Mr. George Hope had a very strong opinion, and I perfectly agreed with him, that it was very necessary for a young man who was to be employed for the greater part of his life abroad, to imbibe in his earlier years those English feelings and sentiments which a young man imbibes at a public school or University. Those questions and answers were directed against a system which my interrogator distinctly condemned, namely, that of sending young men to be educated abroad in foreign languages, and bringing them up, not as Englishmen, but as foreigners; that was the history of Mr. Hope's questions. The tendency of those questions was to establish that at all events the early training of a public servant abroad should be English.

195. According to the Imperial decree of the 18th of August 1856, there are 62 secretaries in all in the French service: in the English service there are five secretaries of embassy, 23 of legation, 34 second secretaries, 13 third secretaries, and 14 attachés, making altogether 89; is not this too great a number: what is the use, for instance, of having three secretaries at Athens, where one would suffice; and three at the Hague, and at Stockholm, and at Stuttgardt?—At the present time the aggregate number, I think, is 61 in the English service, including the secretaries of embassy.

196. I make it out to be 89?—It was so in former times.

197. I make it out to be so at the present time?—You are reckoning in the secretaries of legation.

198. According to the Imperial decree of the 18th of August 1856, there are 62 secretaries in all in the French service; 14 in the first class, 24 in the second, and 24 in the third; in the English service there are five secretaries of embassy, 23 of legation, 34 second secretaries, 13 third secretaries, and 14 attachés, making altogether 89: I ask you, is not that, as compared with the French service, too great a number, and are there not some persons who are employed where they are unnecessary; for instance, three secretaries at Athens?—I am unable to say whether in the French service there are not more than those gentlemen, because they have a class of people whom we have not; I cannot compare the system in the French service, as far as the number of their attachés are concerned, with our own system, and I cannot give you an answer. I cannot say that there are too many, nor that there are too few; all that I say is, that as regards our own service, there are not too many. I must decline making a comparison between our service and another service; so much depends upon the chancellerie regulations of the service they are employed in, that I must decline to give an opinion.

199. At Athens there are three secretaries, two secretaries of legation, and one other secretary; would not one secretary suffice?—A man cannot always live without some relaxation; he must occasionally have leave of absence; and if you lowered the establishment to a minimum, there would be no possibility of any leave of absence being granted.

Rt. Hon. F. Hammond.

10 March 1870.

200. At all events, if there were a secretary of legation, and one other secretary at Athens, would not that be sufficient?—It is impossible in the Foreign Office to say what is the detail business in any mission. A great deal of time is occupied by things which never come before the office; copying and little things are required to be done, which you want an adequate staff to perform, but I have not the particulars of the establishment at Athens; the establishment which was stated, in reply to a Return moved for last Session, only gives one second secretary at Athens; there may be an unpaid attaché, but I am taking this Return.

201. In the Report delivered this morning there are three secretaries?—I see so in that Return; I am referring to another. The Return you allude to applies only to paid members of a mission, of which probably the head is an attaché.

202. There are also three at the Hague, and three at Stockholm, and three at Stuttgardt?—You must allow that for the greater part of the year one of those gentlemen is away. There are very seldom more than two at a place, and that is not too much, because the secretary of legation is not a person who is employed in the chancellerie work; he is superintendent of the chancellerie; you do not put the secretary of legation to do the copying work, which the junior members do. Admitting the statement to be correct, and your Return to be the most correct of the two, the answer is, that if you had only one second or third secretary there would be an impossibility of his ever having leave of absence.

203. The total cost of the mission at Athens, as given in the report delivered this morning, is 6,344*l.*?—Yes, but that total includes not only salaries, but the translator's and servants' wages, and all other miscellaneous expenditure, and 370*l.* for special missions, and 150*l.* for outfit on an average of years. From that sum about 1,500*l.* must be deducted.

204. With reference to the exigencies of the public service, considering that economy is now so necessary in every department of the service, would it not be desirable to reduce the expenditure at so small a place as Athens, by having there, at all events, two secretaries instead of three, or even one secretary?—I think that there must be attached to the mission at Athens a secretary of legation, and two others, either a second secretary, or a third secretary, and an attaché. After four years' service, an attaché necessarily obtains his salary of 150*l.* a year. The attaché obtains salary under a regulation of 1862. When he has served his time, he comes, under the recommendation of the Committee of 1861, upon a salary of 150*l.* a year; but it all resolves itself into this: I cannot tell you the exact detail work in that or in any other mission, but I can perfectly understand that there is a good deal of current business in the office which gives more or less occupation to the members of the mission. If you put only one secretary there, you would render the minister dependent upon that secretary for the whole current work of the mission, because a secretary of legation cannot, considering the standing which he has in the service, be expected to be employed in all the current routine business of the chancellerie. Then, again, unless you have the means of providing for absences, you deprive the second secretary of any relaxation whatever. Now it was very much pressed upon us in 1861, that attachés were entitled to a periodical leave of absence, and admitting the principle that they were entitled to it, and that it was for the good of the service that they should have it, occasionally one of those attachés must come away; they come away alternately. According to the rule, a second secretary at Athens, if he chooses to run his leave into two years, he may be absent for nearly six months at one time; but if the mission were curtailed, there would be no other junior member there to carry on the business.

205. You think that temporarily the secretary of legation could not discharge the duties?—I think that it would be as unreasonable to require the secretary of legation to perform those duties as to require me to perform the duties of docketing and entering in the Foreign Office. I would very gladly assist the clerks upon a pressure, but I should think it very unreasonable and hard upon me if I was put every day, in addition to all my other duties, to do the copying work of the office.

206. In answer to Question 160 of your last day's examination, you said that the block arises from the abolition of five missions; will you mention what missions those were, and how many attachés have been appointed since their abolition?—The missions which were abolished were Hanover, Saxony, Frankfort, Naples, and Florence. There is now only one Italian mission instead of three.

207. In what year were those missions abolished?—The first three were abolished in 1866, and the others I think were abolished soon after the last Italian War. I cannot exactly remember the year.

208. How many attachés have been appointed since the abolition of those missions?—Since 1866 ten attachés seem to have been appointed.

209. Would it not be better where supernumeraries exist, owing to the abolition of missions, to appoint no more attachés until the supernumeraries are absorbed?—Between 1861 and the present time the numbers I think have been diminished by 18. In a Paper which I have here, I have the thing exactly stated. The number of second secretaries in 1869 was 33, the number of third secretaries was 13, and the number of attachés was 17, making in all 63. In 1861 the number of paid attachés was 39, and the number of unpaid attachés was 42, making 81.

210. Then there are now 17 less than there were in 1861?—Yes.

211. Would it not be better when supernumeraries exist from the abolition of missions, to appoint no more attachés until the supernumeraries are absorbed?—But there are no supernumeraries at the present time. Of the seven who were last appointed, three have already been attached to missions, and the others will be attached immediately they have finished their period of probation at the Foreign Office. There are two gentlemen who have just now gone out.

212. If five missions have been abolished, surely there must have been a number of supernumeraries at that time?—I cannot carry back my mind to how those gentlemen who make the difference between the numbers 67 and 81 have been disposed of; we certainly find that the number has been diminished by 17, as I have stated; and therefore if supernumeraries existed at the moment noment of the abolition of those missions, they ave since been disposed of as you wish them to e disposed of, and their places have not been lled up.

213. I am rather inclined to press that ques- on; would it not be better, as a general rule, hen a mission is abolished, not to appoint tachés until the supernumeraries are absorbed? If attachés are not required, of course it would e needless to appoint them, but the abolition of issions does not necessarily imply that the rvices of some of those persons are not required; r instance, the Italian Mission and the Prussian mbassy have had a great deal more labour han they had before. That may possibly be the ay in which some of those gentlemen have been isposed of, but I can only point to the fact that he numbers which now exist on the list are much ess than those which existed in 1861, when I as last examined.

214. The age for entering the service is limited o 25; is there any limit at the other end, or can Minister serve on to any age?—There is no imit at the other end.

215. As a general rule, do you consider a ublic servant as efficient after 65 as he is from 5 to that age?—I must decline to answer that uestion, having myself considerably passed the ge of 65.

216. I find that one diplomatic officer has been 2 years in the service, that another has been 45 ears in the service, another has been 42 years, nother has been 44 years, and that Mr. Charles Barnard has been 54 years, and others in the same way; of course their retirement would do some- hing towards removing the block in the service? —Of course it would have that effect, but I do not know that it would be fair to them, or fair to the public service, and it would certainly not be justifiable upon grounds of public economy; I believe that you are now referring to the am- bassadors; four of those gentlemen would be now entitled to a pension of 1,700*l.* a year each, and the two ministers you have named to a pension of 1,300*l.* a year each; you must supply their places, and therefore there would be a clear loss to the country of 9,400*l.* a year.

217. I am merely speaking with regard to the block?—Their retirement would necessarily make vacancies, but I do not think that any Secretary of State would be justified in saddling the country with a large expenditure for pensions in order to make vacancies for those gentlemen who are coming forward. I have always under- stood that we are not to make vacancies in order to appoint other people to succeed those persons, and to pay pensions in addition.

218. You stated, in your evidence before the Committee of 1861, that you saw no objection to attachés being sent to South American missions; if that were done, the six attachés now at the Foreign Office, or six other junior diplomatic officers, might be absorbed by sending them to Lima, Santiago, Bogota, Guatemala, Quito, and Caraccas?—I have no doubt that you are speaking correctly.

219. In 1861 you stated that you saw no ob- jection to sending junior diplomatic officers to the South American missions?—I have no doubt that I said so, because I thought so, and I think so still; but we do not do so because we wish to keep the establishments as low as we can; but I think that some of those South American missions ought to be raised in character, and I believe that we suffer very considerably in the estimation of those countries, particularly those on the Pacific, for instance, Chili and Peru, by keeping our missions merely on the footing of a chargé d'affaires. I should be very glad to raise the gentlemen who hold them to the position of ministers plenipotentiary, even if the other ar- rangements to which you have alluded should not take place; but I think that it is extremely desirable as regards all our South American missions that a third secretary should proceed in the course of his service to them. As I said on the first meeting of the Committee, I think that very much is to be learnt in those missions, disagreeable as they may be when compared to European missions, and I think that no man would regret in after life having learnt what would tend to make him a very much more efficient man than he would be by merely re- maining at European courts. At those missions questions arise which do not occur so often among European Governments, and a man is called upon to deal with those questions in a manner which tests his judgment and his ability for general public service.

220. At present I believe that clerks are em- ployed at the South American missions in copys ing despatches, and that they also have charge of the archives?—Yes, from necessity. That sys- tem has dated from the time when those mission- were mainly consular establishments, and not as now diplomatic ones. That system was allowed to continue. In the first place it would have been a very hard thing to send out an unpaid attaché to South America, where he would be put to a considerable expense and would have to make a very long voyage; and, in the next place, if we sent a second or third secretary there, I believe that we should have had to increase the number of those classes.

221. But could not attachés be sent there without very much increasing the expenses; some clerks are employed at a salary of 150*l.* a year; of course those clerks could be dispensed with if attachés went, and the attachés could be paid?—Certainly. I should be very glad, as a relief to the diplomatic service, that that should be done; it would relieve the service from a hard- ship or a difficulty which now exists. I am not quite so certain whether the attachés would prefer a residence in South America to a resi- dence in Europe; but, at the same time, the system which you propose would be a great relief with regard to the junior members of the ser- vice.

222. And it would also secure what I believe you are desirous of securing, namely, that clerks in the junior branch of the service should not have charge of the office?—Yes. It is of less consequence in South America than it is in Europe. As a general principle, I should much prefer that the person in charge of the diplomatic chancellerie should be a diplomatic officer.

223. And also the junior diplomatic officer would be on the spot and able to take charge of the mission, supposing that the minister went away?—Yes. At present at some of the missions where there is no junior diplomatic officer the senior consul would take charge.

224. And therefore if it was desired to draw a very clear distinction between consular and diplomatic services, it would be better to have a junior diplomatic officer present?—I should very much prefer it.

Rt. Hon. E. Hammond.

10 March 1870.

225. Do you see any objection to employing junior diplomatic officers instead of consuls in inland places, such as Erzeroum and Warsaw?—As regards Warsaw, a junior diplomatic officer would not do for it. As a rule, of course there is no objection to making a diplomatic officer consul at any place, but Warsaw is rather a a political place.

226. In some places you would see no objection to that course being pursued?—I see no objection to it, though I am afraid that it would be very unpopular with the consular body generally; we might fill up vacancies, as quasi political appointments, in countries like Servia and the Principalities, and Tunis, and Egypt, by members of the diplomatic profession; but at the same time, perhaps, the doing so would be disheartening to the members of the consular profession, as they very often look forward to such appointments as the reward of long services.

227. Is there any suggestion which you can make in order to alleviate the present state of block in the service?—I am afraid that I can make no other suggestion. It would not alleviate the block, but it would alleviate the position of our junior members in some respects, if they were allowed an addition to their salary after a certain number of years' service. When Mr. Secretary Canning laid down the rule (I believe in 1825) that because promotion was slow, a secretary of legation, after 10 years' service, should receive an addition to his pay of 250 l. a year, there was the same block in the higher ranks as there is now in the intermediate ranks; and if the Committee would take that point into consideration, and would recommend it as I put it, I think that the junior members of the diplomatic service would feel very grateful for it. That suggestion I make on their behalf.

228. That system prevails in some of the Government offices, for instance, in the India Office; when a man has served for a certain number of years he gets an advance of pay?—I am not acquainted with the system in the India Office. Before 1825, when the system of classification was introduced, the clerks in the Foreign Office had an increase of pay according to their length of servitude. That system was abolished when the classification of clerks took place, and they are now fast bound in their respective classes; a man cannot go beyond the salary of his class until he gets to the class above him, and I believe that at times that system has acted very severely indeed.

229. In answer to Question No. 108, you stated that Persian is a very easy language; did you state that of your own knowledge?—I have heard that it is easy as compared with Turkish, and I judge it to be so, because I believe that the gentlemen who in former times were appointed to Persia were not long in picking up the colloquial language.

230. Then your remark would probably apply only to the colloquial language?—I believe that no Englishman, however well conversant with Oriental languages, would venture to write a formal note in the language of the country. I have asked the question of people who have been well conversant with Persian, and I have found them shrink from doing so, and that is the reason why in all those places we are obliged to have natives in our service. We have the dragomans in Turkey, and similar persons in Persia, and in China we have writers. It arises from the difficulty of knowing exactly the expressions which ought to be used.

231. You were speaking, in your answer to Question No. 108, of a colloquial knowledge of the language?—Yes.

232. Reading papers is, of course, very different?—I do not exclude reading papers, but I exclude writing the language.

233. Would not Indian officers have an advantage in going to the Persian Mission over those going from Europe, as being generally acquainted with the Persian language?—I am not sufficiently acquainted with the Indian system to be able to state how far that would be the case.

234. Has not the Persian Legation been at times under the India Office?—Yes, it was so up to 1835; it was then handed over to the Foreign Office; at the end of 1858 it was re-transferred to the India Office, and at the end of 1859 it was re-transferred to the Foreign Office.

235. But even while it was under the Foreign Office, the officers at the head of the mission, and some of the other officers, were Indian officers, were they not; for instance, Sir John Macdonald, Sir John M'Neill, Sir Justin Sheil, Colonel Farrant, Sir Henry Rawlinson, and Colonel Pelly?—We took over the members of the mission as we found them; the senior members of the mission were taken over, and Mr. Watson was taken over from the India Office when the mission was re-transferred in 1859.

236. The rupture which took place with Persia took place at a time when an officer was there who had not been trained in the Indian service?—It did; but the previous rupture took place when there was an officer there who had been trained in the Indian service.

237. That second rupture did not proceed to actual war?—Certainly not, because we were not pushed to actual war.

238. Most of the officers in Persia are Indian officers; for instance, the Resident at Bushire, and all the officers of the telegraphic establishment?—The telegraphic officers are not officers of ours; the Resident at Bushire is appointed by the Indian Government.

239. The Resident at Bagdad, who has considerable relations with Persia, is an Indian officer, and the consuls at Zanzibar and Muscat are generally Indian officers, and are always appointed by the Secretary of State for India, and if we send military officers to Persia they will be from the Indian army?—Yes.

240. And you would say, that our relations with Persia are chiefly important with respect to India?—They are, in some respects, important as regards India; but Persia has other neighbours besides our Indian Empire, and if any difficulty arose with those other neighbours, it would concern the empire at large, and must come under the cognisance of the office which deals with countries bordering on Persia. I may, perhaps, assist the Committee if I read the history of the transfers of the Persian Mission, and the causes of them. The ground on which the superintendence of diplomatic relations with Persia was, in 1835, placed under the Foreign Office was, that it was supposed that the counsels of Great Britain would have more weight with the Persian Government, if urged in the name of the Sovereign, than an if tendered merely on behalf of the East dia Company. It is a mistake to look upon rsia only from an Indian point of view. Im- rial interests are very closely bound up with at country. On the north, and on the west, her ritories are bounded by those of two powerful pires, any question with which arising out of rsian affairs can only be discussed directly by e Imperial Government, speaking through the cretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and ough the ground stated, in 1858, for remitting e charge of the Persian Mission to the India fice, the Government of India being then ectly vested in the Crown, namely, that every estion which came under discussion between this ntry and Persia concerned more or less the itish Government in India, was so far correct; t account was not taken of the fact, that rsia, from its contiguity to Turkey and Russia, ne, as far as British interests were generally ncerned, within the dominion of Imperial icy; and if the independence of Persia were ced in jeopardy by her northern or western ghbours, the representations to be made, and good offices to be exerted, on behalf of rsia, could only emanate from the Imperial vernment. This consideration doubtless in- enced the condition on which this transfer was owed to be made, namely, that, as a sine quâ , the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs uld be kept accurately informed of all diplo- tic transactions which might take place at the urt of Teheran. At the close of the year 59, however, within one year after the trans- of the Persian Mission was made to the India fice, the mission was re-transferred to the reign Office, on the ground that there were the Persian Court representatives of France, ssia, and Turkey (and it might be added, w, if not then, which I forget, representatives Persia at those Courts, as well as at Her jesty's Court), and that the matters treated by Her Majesty's Minister at Teheran re necessarily connected with the relations ween England and those three Powers; and t it was therefore necessary that the Secre- y of State, who had to convey instructions to British Minister at Teheran, should be inti- tely acquainted with all that was passing, on stern affairs, between Her Majesty's Govern- nt and the French, Russian, and Persian vernments. The same reason which then sted, founded on such diplomatic relations tween Persian and other Governments, exists, possible, in still greater force at the present ne, and any change in the existing relations tween the Persian Mission and the foreign Go- rnment would tend to injury, not only on perial but also on Indian grounds.

241. Since the Government of India has been ced directly under the Crown, and since the ministration of India has been under a cretary of State who has the same power as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, of rse your objection to the transfer to the India fice has been removed?—That state of things sted in 1859, when the mission was re-trans- red to the Foreign Office.

242. Would not an Indian officer necessarily ve a greater acquaintance with the Persian guage than any officer who could be sent out m this country?—Yes; but it is not merely th Persia alone, but with Persia's neighbours, that the Imperial interests are concerned in regard to Persia.

243. Would you consider that our interests in Persia, with reference to Russia and Turkey, are to be compared with those which relate to India?—Any difficulty which might arise with regard to Persia would be an Imperial difficulty, and might involve us in serious difficulties with Russia and with Turkey. It is therefore important that the control of those matters, which would eventually have to be discussed on Imperial grounds, should altogether be under the authority of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs who would have to discuss them.

244. Any difficulty which might occur in Persia, with reference to Russia, would probably be also with reference to India, judging from past history?—I do not think that it would be desirable, on any account, that Persia should be merged in either of her neighbouring states. It would be certainly undesirable on Indian grounds, and it would be undesirable on Imperial grounds.

245. I believe that India pays the expenses of the missions at Bushire, Bagdad, Muscat, and Zanzibar, and 12,000 l. a-year towards the mission at Teheran, besides all the expenses connected with the telegraph in Persia, and of our flotilla when we have any in the Persian Gulf?—India pays us 12,000 l. a-year for keeping up the Persian Mission; with respect to all the rest, I do not believe that we have any expense, and therefore I suppose that India pays it.

246. The service in Persia is not popular with the diplomatic officers, is it?—I am not aware that it is otherwise than popular.

247. The transfer of the Persian Mission to the India Office would be a gain to the Imperial exchequer, would it not?—The effect of the transfer of the mission in 1858 was that it saddled the Imperial exchequer with an expenditure of about 3,000 l. a year, which it never incurred before. From 1835 up to 1858 we contrived, excepting in two years of difficulty, to keep to the amount allotted to us. Including the two years of difficulty, as far as I remember, I think that we exceeded the 12,000 l. on an average of some years, by about 300 l. a-year. It was a condition which was made when the mission was transferred in 1858, that the Imperial exchequer should pay 3,000 l. a-year to the Indian Government towards the expense of the Persian Mission. I am sorry to say that from 1859, when the mission was re-transferred to the Foreign Office, we have never succeeded in keeping down the expenses to 12,000 l. We are now making a great effort to do so, and we hope that we shall succeed. The general expenses in Persia have increased, but I think that we shall succeed in bringing down the charge for the Persian services nearer to 12,000 l. than it has been of late years.

248. Am I not right in saying that the total expenses of the Persian Mission were in some years as much as 18,000 l.?—All that I remember is, that in 1858 it was insisted upon that the Imperial exchequer should pay 3,000 l. towards the maintenance of the Persian Mission. I myself thought that very wrong, and I protested against it, but unsuccessfully, and now the expenses of the mission exceed on an average 14,000 l. a-year; 12,000 l. is the contribution of the India Office, and I suppose that since 1860 sums varying from 2,000 l. to 3,000 l., and 4,000 l. a-year, have been the charge appearing in the finance accounts, as being an addition to the 12,000 l.

Rt. Hon. E. Hammond.

249. I suppose that there would be no objection to putting in a memorandum showing the total expenses of the Persian Mission from 1860 to the present time?—There would not be the slightest objection to putting it in, except that I cannot put it in for the year when it was under the India Office; I could put it in from 1835; I know that a Return was presented to Parliament some few years ago, which went over a great number of years, and I can put it in.

250. Since 1859?—Yes.

251. Mr. Richard Shaw.] I understood you to express an opinion in favour of keeping the diplomatic and consular appointments separate and distinct; do you mean that you would not recommend the consular service to be used as a stepping stone to the higher service?—I think that it is better that it should not be so.

252. Will you state your reasons for that opinion?—The services are very distinct; the training for the consular service is not calculated for diplomacy. In the evidence which I gave before the former Committee on the consular service, I said that I thought that it would be very undesirable to encourage consuls to look to advancement in the political branch of the service, because it would have a tendency to distract their attention from their proper consular duties, and to induce them to seek to engage in political duties; and we might have a great number of differences with foreign Powers to settle from the over zeal, and the over ambition which our consuls might display; I think that that was the ground which was stated before the Committee of 1858. It was considered desirable that the two services, as far as possible, should be kept distinct; there was no objection to importing occasionally an agent into the diplomatic service from the consular service, or from the consular service into the diplomatic service, but it was thought that, generally speaking, it was better to keep the services distinct; the advantage would be largely in favour of not making diplomatic advancement a thing to be sought for by consuls.

253. Do you look upon the consular service as essentially commercial only, and upon the diplomatic service as essentially political?—Generally so.

254. I believe that the examinations on entering the two services are quite distinct?—Yes.

255. Therefore a person might be quite competent to discharge the duties of a consul, but not competent to discharge those of an attaché or secretary of legation?—I can hardly give you a definite answer to that question, but the training is quite different.

256. Is any person of ordinary intelligence fitted for the duties of a consul?—I presume so; I am not aware that any very high order of intellect is required; of course the higher class of intellect which a man may have the better; but the duties of the consular office do not require high intellect. We have some very able consuls; I must not be understood to say that any person amongst them might be characterised as a person of low intellect, but generally they are quite a different class of men from those in the diplomatic service.

257. You do not require the same high standard of intellect for the consular departments as you require for the diplomatic service?—No.

258. I believe that there are some instances of the promotion of a consul to a diplomatic post; but those cases are rather rare, are they not?—Yes, they are exceptions to the rule. As far as I recollect, the gentlemen in the cases to which you allude have gone through the intermediate training of consuls general and chargé d'affaires. I think that originally, though not now, almost all the South American appointments were held by gentlemen who began as consuls general, as commercial officers, but when political relations were entered into with the countries, the higher diplomatic rank of chargé d'affaires was superadded to that of consul general, and in some instances persons were appointed from the diplomatic branch.

259. If such a system was general, do you not think that it would create great dissatisfaction in the diplomatic corps?—I cannot doubt that it would do so.

260. If you preferred attachés to the consular body, would it not create great dissatisfaction in the consular body?—Yes; I have said so. With regard to transferring them to certain higher consular officers I should make a distinction, because there are certain consular officers who are almost political.

261. I am speaking of the consular establishments generally; I am aware that there are certain exceptions?—I think that it would occasion very great dissatisfaction, and a very just dissatisfaction, in the consular service, if a diplomatic officer were named a consul at one of our large commercial consulates, for instance, such as at Marseilles, or New York, or any of those consularships where the salary is high, and the position is great. Those, I think, are the prizes to be looked to by the consular service.

262. Am I right in assuming that gentlemen in the diplomatic service receive a special education of a political character before entering it?—That is a question which I cannot answer; I know nothing of the young men before they are named.

263. What is the nature of the examination?—The examination is stated in a Return, which has been put in.

264. Is it usual to appoint attachés and secretaries to consulates?—No; speaking on the spur of the moment, I do not remember an instance of it.

265. Mr. Monson, I think, was appointed last year?—He had left the service for five years; he had ceased to be a third secretary; it was not a transfer from one service to the other.

266. Where was he appointed?—At the Azores.

267. I believe that the trade between this country and the Azores is very insignificant?—I am not able to say.

268. Do you know the population?—No. For many years past, the consular department has not been at all under my control. I shall be perfectly ready to enter into any of the general matters of the consular service, but upon the details I cannot speak.

269. Are there any political interests in the Azores which require the intervention of any representative representative from this country?—I apprehend that you could not have a diplomatic agent in the Azores, because you do not have a diplomatic agent except at the capital of a country.

270. Are there any diplomatic interests?—if there are such interests they can only be treated, as in all other consulates, by a diplomatic channel. If a treaty is neglected, or if an undue exaction of duty is made, justice can only be obtained, supposing that the influence of the consul with the local authorities is not sufficient, through the diplomatic representative at the Court.

271. At Marseilles would not the consuls communicate directly with the Foreign Office here?—Yes. If the consul at Marseilles could settle a matter with the local authorities, he would do so; but failing that, he must communicate with the ambassador at Paris.

272. Are there particular functions at the Azores which, in your opinion, render it necessary to have a political consul there?—He is not a political consul.

273. He was an attaché?—Yes; but he had entirely ceased to belong to the diplomatic service.

274. Are there any duties in connection with our establishments in those islands which an ordinary consul could not discharge?—I cannot speak about the Azores; the gentleman who is there is nothing but an ordinary consul.

275. You say that you are not acquainted with the details?—I am not acquainted with the details of the consular service.

276. Mr. Rylands.] I think that you have said that the unpaid attachés are nominated by the Foreign Secretary?—Yes.

277. And that all the members of the diplomatic service enter into the service through the door of unpaid attachéship?—That is the rule.

278. And that that door is opened or closed by the Foreign Secretary at his own will and pleasure?—All appointments are under the exclusive nomination of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

279. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs can introduce any person whom he likes as an unpaid attaché, or can refuse to introduce any person as an unpaid attaché?—Of course, as is the case in all other Government offices, and with all other appointments whatever; there is no distinction in that respect between the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and every other person who has an office to control.

280. I think that I may assume that there is a considerable pressure for nominations to unpaid attachéships?—I know that there are a considerable number of applications.

281. In fact, the idea that persons would not like their sons and nephews, and connections to go into that service is not borne out when you consider the pressure which is put upon the Foreign Secretary for these appointments?—I believe that to be the case. The word "pressure" is too strong a term, but the Secretary of State receives a great number of applications for appointments as attaché.

282. In experience is it not found that the few unpaid attachéships are granted by the Foreign Secretary to personal friends, or political friends of his own?—I am not competent to say upon what ground the Secretary of State makes any appointment.

283. From your knowledge of the facts which have come under your observation, will not the nominations to the Foreign Office, being at the will and pleasure of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, naturally flow into channels in which he is more particularly interested, either from friendship or from family or other connections?—That is a question which I have some difficulty in answering. The first intimation of an appointment being about to be made, is most frequently conveyed to me by a minute, saying that a person is appointed. It is not within my province to know anything about the motives of it.

284. What is the average number of vacancies every year in the diplomatic service?—I think that there are two a year.

285. I speak with reference to the higher offices of the diplomatic service; what is the number of vacancies in a year?—I cannot say.

286. Do you think that it is three?—I should not say that the average is even one in 12 months.

287. But a vacancy has been filled up in the 12 months?—Yes.

288. As a matter of course the number of persons who go in at the door which is opened by the Foreign Secretary have to go out somewhere?—Every person entering the service as attaché doubtless hopes, if he lives long enough, to rise to the rank of ambassador, and there is nothing to preclude him from doing so; and in all probability, so far as the rank of a secretary of legation and a secretary of an embassy is concerned, he will, as a general rule, rise to the top of the list.

289. There has been only one vacancy during the last 12 months, which is rather more than usual, and the Foreign Secretary opened the door for six members of the diplomatic profession?—In addition to that I think that there have been some deaths and resignations.

290. Of course my question included the promotions which would lead to vacancies in the service?—One secretary of legation retired. There have been several retirements.

291. Will you state what is the average number of vacancies in the diplomatic service, and what number of vacancies have occurred within the last 12 months arising out of deaths, resignations, or promotions?—I will endeavour to obtain that information for the Committee.

292. With reference to nominations to unpaid attachéships, is not the effect of the nomination by the Foreign Secretary that a very considerable number of gentlemen who have been introduced into the diplomatic service through that door have been connected with the aristocratic classes?—I cannot answer that question. In one of the papers there is a statement of the names of gentlemen who are now existing, and who have been for a good number of years in the service.

293. Is it not the fact that the introduction of unpaid attachés on the nomination of the Foreign Secretary has led to a very considerable number of members of the aristocracy being members of the diplomatic service?—If I am to understand by "members of the aristocracy" members of noble families who would have the word "honourable" prefixed to their names, I should not say that that is the case. I do not think that there are now many such persons, but I am very little acquainted with the families of the members of the service. I find in the list the name of the Honourable Edward Lytton—that is Lord Lytton's son. There is also the Honourable Mr. West; he is the son of the late Lord De la Warr; but there are others who are not members of a noble family. According to this list there are very few such persons among the secretaries of legation. I only see in this list the names of four gentlemen having the word "honourable" affixed to their names.

10 March 1870.

294. Then you do not think that the statement made by Mr. Layard, a few years ago, that very many persons in the diplomatic service belonged to the aristocratic class, is correct?—I cannot criticise any statement which Mr. Layard has made; my impression is that, as a general rule, there is no preference shown to the aristocracy in the appointment of members of the diplomatic service; that is to say, the aristocracy of birth; the aristocracy of wealth, for the reason which I have given you, must be taken into consideration, because it is necessary that a man should have a certain amount of private means, or that his parents should be able to supply him with those means, in order to enable him to live in a very expensive service.

Rt. Hon. E. Hammond.

14 March 1870.

295. Chairman.] YOU have some Papers, I believe, that you wish to put in, in answer to questions asked you the other day?—Yes; Mr. Eastwick asked me the expenditure on the Persian Mission, and I thought that I could give it more completely than I did then, and I have had it made out from 1835 to 1869. Then he asked me also about the comparative numbers of the French and the English diplomatic service. The honourable Member did not turn over the leaf which he was reading from, and therefore he did not observe that in that book, in addition to the secretaries whom he mentioned, there were 24 attachés mentioned. But, since, I have got the exact details from Paris, and the result is that our mission service consists of 85 officers, exclusive of heads of missions, and the French of 124. That Paper I will put in. Then there was another question, by the same honourable Member, about the large establishment of the English Mission at Athens. I find that the French have there a minister, a third secretary, acting as first, two attachés, and a chancelier; that is to say, one more than we have. I was also asked the other day about the property and the social qualification for appointments to the diplomatic service. Out of that Blue Book which the honourable Member was reading, I have taken the qualifications in the different services, and I find that in almost every service, for instance, in the French, the Austrian, the Dutch, the Russian, the Italian, the Belgian, the Bavarian, the Danish, the Prussian, the Spanish, and the Portuguese services, there is either a specific money qualification, or a requirement of social position. In the Austrian service, for instance, it is said that a man who seeks to belong to it must be a person fitted by education to move in the higher classes of society. I will put that Paper in. Then Mr. Shaw asked me the value of the British trade with the Azores. I find that in 1868 the import and export trade exceeded 500,000 l., and that the tonnage of ships entered and cleared was rather over 70,000 tons. Then Mr. Rylands wished to know the distribution of the numbers of the diplomatic body between the noble families and commoners. That is rather a difficult Return to make out, because a great number of them belong only very indirectly to noble families; but giving to the credit of noble families all that you could possibly assign to them, you will find that there were 50 connected with noble families, against 70 not connected with noble families. I believe that that is correct, but in the 50 there are certainly included more than ought perhaps strictly to be included; the relationship being so distant. Then I was pressed about what might be called the block in the profession. Now the block in the profession does not arise from its being over-stocked by persons, but from the fact that we have been deprived of five missions and five secretaryships, and the chances of promotion, therefore, are smaller. But I have taken the average of the year 1861 and the year 1870. The number of second and third secretaries and attachés in 1861 was 81, which gave upon the average rather less than three to each embassy and mission. In the year 1870 the number of second and third secretaries and attachés is 61, which also gives on the average rather less than three to each embassy and mission. Therefore it is not that the profession is over-stocked, but that the chances of promotion are limited. The last Paper that I have to put in, is a statement of the average number of vacancies in the diplomatic service in the five years ending December 1869. They are as follows: three ambassadors (you cannot make a yearly average of that number); 10 ministers, the yearly average being two; five chargés d'affaires, the yearly average being one; six secretaries of embassy, the yearly average being one one-fifth; 17 secretaries of legation, the yearly average being three two-fifths; and 22 second secretaries, the yearly average being four two-fifths. The third secretaries are appointed without reference to vacancies. Then another question asked me by Mr. Rylands was the number of vacancies leading to promotion from the 1st of January 1869. There were one chargé d'affaires and consul general, two secretaries of legation, and two second secretaries, making five in all.

Rt. Hon. E. Hammond.

296. Mr. Rylands.] I think you did not say what number of appointments had been made of unpaid attachés during the five years that you have referred to?—My attention was not directed to that in regard to five years, but only in regard to 1869; but I can state it in a moment. There were 18 such appointments from the 9th of August 1865.

297. Including the six named last?—Yes, including them; all told.

298. That is an average of rather under four a year?—Yes.

299. In asking you, with respect to the constitution of the service as regards members of noble families, of course I need hardly say that I did so with no invidious motive, or that we should not all be pleased to see the junior members of the aristocracy achieving distinction in an open service; but you quite understand the difference between that and a close patronage system, allowing only the introduction of a particular class of society?—Of course that is quite an abstract question. I can only be called upon, I think, to deal with the question as a practical question, and the result of dealing with it as a practical question is what I have already stated, that at the present time there are in the service 50 officers whom we can contrive by one way or another to connect with noble families, and that there are 70 commoners. Having stated that fact, I should hope to be excused from answering the abstract question.

300. You are quite aware, no doubt, that taking simply the European missions, the number of members of noble families in proportion to commoners would be very much greater than it would be, taking the whole of the missions over the world; simply confining your answer to the European missions, would you be prepared to say that there are not two-thirds of those missions occupied by persons connected with noble families?—Those figures which I have given you apply to all our missions; wherever there is a secretary or an attaché, those gentlemen come within the average which I have named.

301. But you are aware that in the European missions there is a much larger proportion of members of aristocratic families?—The reason of that may be that, except in Brazil and Buenos Ayres, we have none of the lower ranks at all in the regular diplomatic service in South America; there may be a translator here and there; but no member of the diplomatic service, properly so called, is employed in South America in a junior capacity, except in Buenos Ayres and Brazil.

302. I think you are quite alive to the fact which you stated to the Committee, that the expense of men living in foreign capitals on their own resources practically shuts out every man who has not a fortune of his own?—It does, certainly.

303. Do you think that the public are likely to remain satisfied with a system which restricts appointments in an important branch of the public service to persons of family connections or interest, or in possession of wealth?—I can only answer that question by another. Are the public prepared to pay the expense of another system?

304. The present system in fact shuts out the sons of poor clergymen or of gentlemen of small means, or the sons of tradesmen who may have acquired a university education, and are otherwise suited to fill positions in the public service?—Necessarily it does; for as I stated before, with regard to small tradesmen, without at all wishing to disparage that class of the community, I should say that, as a general rule, the son of a small tradesman was not quite the person to go into the first society of foreign capitals.

305. Are you not aware that there are cases in other professions, say in the Church and in the law, where some of the most distinguished persons, archbishops and lord chancellors, have been the sons of barbers and butchers?—I am perfectly aware of that; but what may be very good in this country may not quite suit the taste of a foreign country. I think that if the members of our diplomatic service are to move in the first foreign society (and it is indispensable for the diplomatic service that our junior members should move in that society), they should be persons in the same social position as those amongst whom they move. And you will allow me to say that those sons of tradesmen, though they may rise in this country by their talents to the highest rank, are not in that highest rank when they commence their career as young men of 21. You must bear in mind that if the son of a tradesman in this country became lord chancellor his grandson would derive his status in a foreign society, not from his grandfather, but from his father.

306. Do you not think that this class of young men looking forward to a career entirely dependent upon their own exertions are more likely to be zealous, attentive, and efficient in the fulfilment of duty than fashionable young men of family or wealthy connections who look to other sources of income?—My own experience of the gentlemen of whatever class of society who are appointed to the diplomatic service, does not enable me to answer that question in the affirmative. I believe that the gentlemen appointed within my memory (which now runs over a period of 40 years) to the diplomatic service are as zealous, as able, and as competent to perform the duties of the service as persons of any other class of society.

307. Is it not the fact that the present system of appointing young gentlemen of family and position as unpaid attachés has been complained of by ministers abroad as subversive of good discipline?—I cannot say that it has. You are alluding to what passed in 1861; but I believe, if you look at that evidence very closely, you will find that as a general rule, although our Ministers and ambassadors of that day who were examined before the Committee thought it a great hardship that men should be called upon to serve without pay, yet they had no fault to find with the zeal, or ability or diligence of any of their unpaid attachés.

308. I have got before me a Despatch from Lord Cowley to Lord John Russell, presented to the Committee of 1861, in which he says, "I think the principle itself of exacting work without pay is a bad one. It is, to a certain extent, subversive of good discipline, because no chief likes to exercise even a necessary authority over an unsalaried subordinate, while the subordinates themselves are not unnaturally apt to grow careless under a system which leaves them so long in suspense." What have you to say to that?—That was an abstract opinion of Lord Cowley's; but but you will not find in Lord Cowley's evidence, or in the evidence from any mission, an opinion bearing out that as the practical result of the system.

309. You do not agree with that opinion?—I am not called upon to agree to or disagree with an abstract proposition. I can only speak to this Committee of the real state of things, and for that I can answer confidently.

310. I think you told us that there was a difference between the nomination to attachéships and to clerkships in the Foreign Office?—There is no difference in the nomination, but in the examination.

311. In the one case there is a test examination, and in the other case there is a modified competitive examination?—Yes; the test examination being very severe, the modified competition being slight, according to the necessities of the service in which they are respectively called upon to be employed.

312. The training in the Foreign Office, and that in foreign missions, I presume, are of a different character?—I hardly know how to answer your question. In both cases persons are engaged about the same business, but the training of the Foreign Office is that which is calculated and designed to enable the office to keep in check and to regulate the whole service abroad; the service abroad, on the other hand, does not regulate the Foreign Office.

313. Which do you think is the best training, the training which a young man gets in the Foreign Office, or that which he gets in a foreign mission?—They are each for their respective objects equally good; but it is very desirable that a young man going abroad should have a certain knowledge of the details of the cognate business, you may say, carried on in a large office like ours, which may be useful to him in his after life, as making him acquainted with the manner of transacting business on a large scale; his training is, in point of fact (I believe as is the case in every trade), an apprenticeship. You do not put a person to exercise any trade or any mechanical profession whatever, without passing him through an apprenticeship, and the early part of his career is the attaché's apprenticeship. And I may go still further, and say that a person in trade, when he has passed his apprenticeship, does not think that he has done all that is required for his education in life; but he studies this and studies that, and he goes here and goes there for further instruction, and just in the same manner an attaché studies abroad what is requisite for him to learn. A man may come home occasionally to refresh his memory as to the manner of carrying on business in the Foreign Office.

314. Then am I to gather from your reply that you do not think that the training in the Foreign Office is in any way superior to the training in missions abroad?—The training is for quite a different purpose; you cannot draw a comparison between them, except in so far that they are both trainings; you cannot say that one is better, or that the other is better. You train a man for the law, and you train a man for the Church. Both trainings may be equally good, but they are very different from each other.

315. What are the duties of unpaid attachés?—I can only say generally that they are employed in common with all the members of the mission to carry on the business of the mission. Whether a specific paper is given them to copy or not, or whether a specific duty is imposed upon them, it is impossible for me to say. I dare say that any ambassador can tell you very well on what they are employed. All I say is that they are employed, I presume, in the same manner as all our clerks are employed; and all our clerks are employed generally in their several degrees upon the business of the office.

316. Are they required to be regular in their attendance at the legations, and punctual in the performance of duty?—There is a rule laid down on the subject by the Foreign Office, but it depends upon the heads of missions whether they enforce that rule; we do not enforce it; and I should be sorry to have a daily attendance book sent from each mission every year among their other returns; we do not require such a thing at the Foreign Office, for this reason, that in the Foreign Office (and the remark applies also to our missions abroad) the junior members are often very severely taxed, and are liable to be called upon at all hours (and especially is that the case abroad), not only in the day, but in the night; and therefore, if you tax those gentlemen in that way, you must not lay down or enforce any very stringent rules, because if your rule as to attendance is stringent, the attaché has a right to require that it should act both ways; supposing, for instance, the rule says that he may go away at five o'clock, and you enforce his coming at 12, you would have no right to require him to stay after five o'clock; and that state of things would be of very great detriment to the public service. In all those missions abroad, as well as in our own Foreign Office, it is a sort of give and take thing for work; the work must be done whatever sacrifice it may impose upon those required to do it; and I believe that in some of our missions, at certain times, great labour at very irregular hours is imposed upon the service; it is not only in dispatching and copying papers that labour is involved, but telegrams are coming in at all hours of the night, which attachés must perhaps spend hours in deciphering. A telegram is not correctly sent, perhaps; and I, myself, have spent a couple of hours in making out a figure; nobody can tell the strain upon the mental and bodily capacity of a man from being put upon those things at what may be called unlawful hours.

317. I may assume that there can be no doubt that a very large amount of the public duty of an attaché in a foreign mission will consist in copying papers?—I cannot give you any definite answer as to what are the duties of an attaché in a foreign mission, for we see but little of them: but I take it that at Paris and at all the larger places frequented much by our countrymen, a great deal of the time of the attachés and others is taken up in seeing people and in transacting their various little affairs, for which they have recourse to the mission, and which are very important to them, but which certainly nobody would ever think of reporting home.

318. Again, I suppose I may gather from your answer that it would be desirable for the Committee to get evidence on this point from some head of a mission?—I have given the Chairman a list of as many as I could think of who were in this country.

319. Referring to the point about paying the unpaid attachés, would it not be better in your opinion for the efficiency of the public service, to have only paid officials, and to see that the public got sufficient work in return for the salary ?—To the latter part of your question I would answer that, salary or no salary, you have the work most efficiently performed without reference to the question of no pay or any amount of pay. I cannot admit that any member of our diplomatic service is at all influenced in the discharge of his duties by the consideration of emolument or no emolument. As regards the former part of the question, it is really a question of expense; are the public prepared to pay what it is necessary that a man to be useful at a foreign mission should possess, or are they not?—I should be very sorry to present to the House of Commons an estimate to cover the really necessary and indispensable expenditure of the junior members of our service. They are of no use to you unless they can move in the first circles of society. It is there that a great deal of the current information which it is desirable for the Government to obtain is picked up; and they must make friends with people to obtain it, and also with the diplomatic body. Then, too, you must remember that foreign Governments would not be guided by our precedent if we were to put a different class of men into our missions; yet if we had a different class of men in our missions that class of men could not associate on equal terms with the members of other foreign legations; they would be in a most mortifying position, and one in which I do not think any person would wish to see them placed. Upon that point I wish to read an extract from a Paper which I have put in; it is a despatch from Sir Alexander Malet when he was envoy at Frankfort in 1860: "In continental countries a decided preference is shown by all Governments for employing in this grade of the profession (attachés) young men of some definite rank or position; and there is no use in disguising the fact that the want of these adjuncts acts as a virtual disqualification, and where, as occasionally happens, persons of inferior birth are employed, they meet with mortifications discouraging to young men seeking entrance into the first ranks of foreign society." I think that really meets your question.

14 March 1870.

320. Must I understand, then, that in your opinion there would be no greater efficiency secured in the public service by having paid officials in the place of unpaid attachés?—In my opinion there would be no greater efficiency secured.

321. You were asked on a former occasion whether a much lower class of labour than that of secretaries of legation could be got on the spot for mere copying, and I think that you disputed the practicability of that?—I answered the question by saying that at this present moment our attachés receive nothing; you cannot pay a man less than nothing. Our third secretaries receive 150 l. a year, and you could not send a copyist to a foreign country to live at that rate of salary. The next point is that that copyist, who I understand should only be employed upon mere common work, not confidential work, would, for a great part of the business of the mission, be perfectly useless. You must provide a sufficient staff in a mission to discharge confidential business, and you cannot say how much time may have to be devoted to that confidential business when it arises. I have no doubt that it happens in most of our large embassies and missions abroad, as it does in the Foreign Office at home, that at times, particularly on post days, they are hard pressed by confidential business, which could not be entrusted to any but confidential and trained servants, and that their staff is not more than adequate to perform that business. But I went on to say that neither in a foreign mission, nor in the Foreign Office at home, is the pressure of confidential business continual; still there must be a sufficient number of the class of persons competent to discharge that confidential business, come when it may. There may be only one or two hours to get through a great mass of such work, and if you could not find employment for attachés when that pressure had ceased, you would have a number of idlers about the office, who would be no use there, and would do harm to themselves and to everybody else.

322. I think I understood you to say that, in respect to the promotion of attachés, there was a regular succession, and practically no selection?—That is practically the case.

323. Efficiency on the one hand or inattention on the other, are practically not recognised?—We have no complaints in regard either to efficiency or attention. I cannot say what we should do with a case of marked inefficiency or marked inattention if it were reported to us by the head of the mission. Those things, I am happy to say, do not occur.

324. But practically, under the ordinary circumstances of the case, there is no method of rewarding exceptional zeal and ability and activity in the public service on the part of those young men in the way of promotion?—I wish there was, for there was a case the other day in which one of our public servants did distinguish himself extremely, and we asked the Treasury to grant him some recognition of his services, but we did not succeed in obtaining it.

325. Is it not a fact that promotion of clerks in the Foreign Office depends, to some extent, upon competency?—It does.

326. May not the Secretary of State pass over a man because he has not so conducted himself as to be worthy of promotion?—Unquestionably.

327. Do you see any reason why the appointments to the Foreign Office and to the diplomatic service should not be made on precisely the same grounds?—I believe they are, for aught I know.

328. Except in the point which was referred to just now, that in the one case there is restricted competition, and in the other a test examination?—Yes.

329. I think I understood you to say that the test examination which has been recently applied to the persons nominated for the diplomatic service has been found to be an advantage?—Certainly.

330. Do you not think that a greater amount of competition, perhaps even open competition, might be still more advantageous in securing efficient civil servants in the diplomatic department?—I do not think that it would be desirable to have open competition, nor indeed do I think it necessary to have even limited competition for attachéships in the diplomatic service. You might perhaps have some difficulty in finding candidates for that employment disposed to go through a competitive examination with the chance of failing, when they were to serve for four years without pay.

331. But supposing that there was no unpaid work in the department, that objection of yours would would be removed?—It would be mitigated; but after all, even with a limited competition, you might assume that as the same care must be taken in selecting persons for the diplomatic service as there is now, competitors would not be sent in to the examination, unless, irrespective of their book learning, they were likely to prove useful members of the diplomatic body.

332. You are aware that in the Indian service open competition is now adopted?—You cannot compare the two services; they have nothing on earth to do with each other.

333. I find a letter on that subject from Mr Ward to Lord John Russell, which is also included in the Report of the Committee of 1861; I think Mr. Ward is a man of very considerable experience?—Mr. Ward, I should say, is only accidentally in the diplomatic service.

334. But he has had considerable experience, has he not?—In the consular service he has, but not much experience in the diplomatic service, only from the time that he was appointed as minister at Hamburgh, his previous occupation being that of consul general.

335. How long ago was he appointed minister at Hamburgh?—He was appointed there in 1865; but then I must remind you that Hamburgh is not on the same footing as courts where a Sovereign is the ruling power. The Hans Towns are a conglomeration of states, and the diplomatic body of Hamburgh was in some respects not quite on the same footing as in other places where there is a court representation going on.

336. Mr. Ward expresses the opinion in the despatch to which I refer, that it would be desirable to apply to the diplomatic service the system of open competition; do you agree with that?—I entirely disagree, and everybody else who has anything to do with the diplomatic service would entirely disagree with it.

337. Is there any reason why the service of the Foreign Office, and the diplomatic service, should not be assimilated, and the ranks in each, up to a certain point, be the same; that there should be, in fact, a corresponding line of promotion in the two services, the gradations in the two services being made the same, so that if it were necessary to exchange, for instance, a junior clerk of a certain standing with a second secretary of a certain standing, there should be no difficulty in the matter of pay or pension?—The difference would be this: a second secretary would not like to be transferred as a junior clerk in the Foreign Office, who commences with salary at 100*l.* a year, going up to 150*l.*, and then, when he gets into his next class, commences at 150*l.*, and rises 10*l.* a year till he gets up to 300*l.* I do not think that any regulated interchange between second secretaries and the class of our junior clerks would be serviceable or practicable.

338. My question goes to ask you, whether there is any objection to the grades of promotion and the pay being assimilated; do you see any reason why certain ranks in the diplomatic service should not be placed on precisely the same footing, as regards pay and pension, with certain ranks in the Foreign Office, so that the promotion in the grades of the two services should be the same?—In the first place, as regards pensions, the two services are regulated by two different Acts of Parliament; one comes under the Diplomatic Act, and the other comes under the ordinary Superannuation Act, and, therefore, you could not assimilate them in that respect.

339. But this Committee is about to report to Parliament, and I suppose that Parliament has the power, if it thinks it right, to remove all those difficulties by altering the Act that you allude to?—Except that it would involve the placing one branch of the civil service on a different footing from that on which all the others stand; it would place the pensions of the Foreign Office, as compared with the general civil service of the country, upon a different footing than it is now on.

340. But it would be the same footing with that of the diplomatic service?—No.

341. The House of Commons might make it the same?—The House of Commons might make it the same, but the effect of making it the same would be to make a distinction between one Government office and all other Government offices in the country.

342. But the one Government office would be made to correspond with the great department with which it is connected; I mean the diplomatic service?—I presume that there would be an objection, in principle, to taking one of the Government offices out of the general category, which includes it and all the others. That really is a question, however, which I am scarcely able to deal with.

343. I simply wanted to know your opinion as to whether it was desirable?—Perhaps without dealing with the question of pay or pension, I may say that there is nothing now to prevent interchanges, permanent or temporary, between the respective classes of certain gentlemen in the Foreign Office and certain gentlemen in the diplomatic service. We will not go into the question, looking at it in a pecuniary point of view; but there is nothing in the regulations (as you will see stated in my evidence in the Blue Book before you) to prevent amalgamation of the two services on that basis. Beyond the first class of juniors, I should protest most decidedly against any change between either our senior clerks or assistants, and our secretaries of legation. I say that, because the term amalgamation implies that they may be indifferently employed in one or the other service.

344. My question points to this: in the Foreign Office your clerks may rise through various grades to Under Secretaries of State, without looking to be foreign secretaries; so I am suggesting that similar grades of promotion should exist in the diplomatic service, by which the officers there should rise to secretaries of missions without looking ever to be heads of missions?—But surely it comes to much the same thing. An attaché looks to rise to a third secretary, and a third secretary to a second, and a second secretary to a secretary of legation, and a secretary of legation to a secretary of embassy.

345. And a secretary of embassy to be a minister?—Yes.

346. But it is not the fact that the clerks in the Foreign Office look forward to being foreign secretaries?—I cannot say what any man looks forward to. You suggested to me just now that the son of a tradesman might look forward to being Lord Chancellor; and I cannot say that the clerks in the Foreign Office may not look forward to being foreign secretaries.

347. In regard to that circumstance of the position of the first secretary of an embassy of legation towards the head of the mission, have you never had complaints at the Foreign Office of the jealousies which have arisen in consequence of the position which the first secretary so holds towards the head of the mission?—I have heard certainly that two men living together have not always agreed. But there is nothing in the official relation between a secretary of legation and the head of a mission that is different from the relation between an Under Secretary of State and the Secretary of State. I am happy to say that I have always got on very well with my Secretaries of State, and I believe that a secretary of legation gets on well as a rule with the head of the mission.

Rt. Hon. E. Hammond.

14 March 1870.

348. Everybody knows the public office which you hold, but in the case of the secretary of legation, he might step into the shoes of his chief, whereas that could not possibly be a matter of ambition to you; you are certainly satisfied, I think, with the very distinguished position you are in without aspiring to be Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs?—If you mean that a secretary of legation might wish to trip up the heels of his chief, I cannot admit the propriety of such a suggestion.

349. I am asking you in reference to the jealousies which have arisen; I was anxious to know whether it had not come under your knowledge that the position which a secretary of legation occupies in relation to his chief has led in some cases to jealousies?—I should be very much surprised if I were made the confidant of those jealousies.

350. I have before me a despatch from Lord Napier to Lord John Russell, which is given in the Report to the Select Committee on Diplomatic Service of 1861; I presume that Lord Napier's authority in this matter will be admitted to be of some weight. At page 395 he says, "The secretary may be an older man than his master; he may be an abler man; he may have filled the same office as chargé d'affaires, and may look to fill it again; he is the predecessor of his chief; he is the heir of his chief; he is not always his chief's friend. By many avenues jealousies may be insinuated between the minister and his secretary"?—The only observation which I have to make upon that is, that Lord Napier is stating the question hypothetically; he does not state what has occurred; he is arguing what might be, not what is.

351. I wish to ask you whether, in your opinion, there might not be great advantage in the two services being amalgamated in the way that I have suggested, in your being able to entrust special duties to clerks of tried efficiency and experience, by sending them to foreign legations when any emergency arose, or by bringing secretaries from abroad when they might be more useful at home?—There is nothing to prevent it now; we have got two of our clerks abroad. I was twice abroad as a clerk myself, and I believe that most of our clerks, of a certain standing, have at one time or other been employed in foreign missions. We do not think of establishing that gradation of rank between them which you suggest. All our servants connected with the Foreign Office, clerks or diplomatists, are liable to have to perform any duties which the Secretary of State, for the benefit of the public, might think proper to impose upon them. For instance, when Lord Russell went to Vienna, the Secretary of State desired me to accompany him; I went cheerfully, though at that time, for a particular reason, it was inconvenient to me to leave England; there was not a word of remonstrance from me, indeed I felt very much honoured and flattered by being selected to go. And so it might be again. It would very much inconvenience me at my age, and with a family, to be obliged to go abroad, but if Lord Clarendon were to say to me, "I wish you to go and assist such an embassy for a time," I should feel it my duty to go, and I should go.

352. But if the two services were thoroughly amalgamated, would it not enable you to give promotion to men of the greatest efficiency in the two services, and so to arrange the members of the services as to relieve to some extent the block which everybody is crying out about?—But I have explained already that I believe that that idea of the block is altogether fallacious.

353. I would just call your attention in reference to the suggestion I have been making to a recommendation of Lord Cowley's. Lord Cowley states that he is an advocate for the complete amalgamation of the Foreign Office with the displomatic service; he says, "the clerks in Her Majesty's Foreign Office would, I conceive, profit as much from an occasional residence abroad as the secretaries and attachés of Her Majesty's foreign missions would gain by an occasional residence in England. If I saw how this system could be extended to the higher branches of the foreign services, I should equally advocate its application. But if the junior branches of the two services are amalgamated, it stands to reason that those who now enter the Foreign Office, with no expectation beyond that of rising to a chief clerkship, will be as eligible as anyone else to a mission abroad. It seems to me that the chief clerks might be assimilated to secretaries of embassy, the second clerks to secretaries of legation, and the junior clerks to attachés, in one or more ranks, as may be deemed most convenient; and when I say assimilated, I mean that there should be a constant change going on between the home and foreign services"?—With due deference to Lord Cowley, I should say that he has never, to my knowledge, worked in the Foreign Office; he may, for aught I know, have done so, but ever since I was in the office I do not remember that he ever worked there. But then I speak from my own position as Under Secretary of State. I cannot consent to sacrifice the interests of the Foreign Office to those of the diplomatic service. It would be absolute ruin to the Foreign Office to encourage or allow our senior clerks, as a general rule, to leave us, in order to go abroad and be exchanged for people who have not had the training which we in the Foreign Office have had. It is indispensably necessary for the Foreign Office, and for every office under the Crown, that the heads of the office (I am not speaking of myself, but of two or three of the upper classes of clerks) should know from personal experience all the duties of the office. They cannot efficiently conduct the duties unless they know the minutest details. And I may be allowed to say to the Committee that my experience as a junior clerk, dating from 1824, constantly serves me in the greatest stead when I wish to arrive at the knowledge of past events in order to guide me at the present time. It was only the other day that a paper came before me on which it was necessary to refer to a transaction which took place in the year 1835. My memory enabled me at once to tell where to get the explanation of that transaction, and of course saved a great deal of research. I have been able at once from memory to tell the clerks where to get all the details of that business, otherwise they might have had to search for it through years of correspondence. And what I can do every senior clerk, and I may say almost every assistant clerk who has been long in the office, ought to be able to do, and it is that which makes the services of the senior clerks so valuable. And perhaps I may add, and I hope my colleagues in the Foreign Office will not object to my saying it, that when I first came in as Under Secretary, we had lost, from one cause or other, a great number of our senior clerks and others, who, from standing, might have supplied their place; and the inconvenience was so severely felt of the want of that knowledge which we ought to have derived from that class of officers in the department, that we (I mean Lord Wodehouse and myself) did the very unusual thing of sending a memorandum to the senior clerks, pointing out to them what was expected of them, and enjoining upon them to understand their position, and to make themselves competent to perform the duties of it. Now no secretary of embassy, no secretary of legation, not one person in the diplomatic service, could render to the Foreign Office those services which we expect, and which we must receive from the first and second classes of our clerks. It is all very well for myself, who have been trained in the office, and who knows the office from the beginning, and have a tolerably good memory; but if my successor should be a gentleman unconnected with the office, he would have entirely to depend, at all events at first, upon the senior members of the office for carrying on the very current details of the office.

354. Of course I did not suppose for a moment that there should be constant changes, but that there should be occasional changes in cases of emergency?—Persons so taken from the diplomatic service would be of no use to us at all. Speaking with all respect (and I do feel a great respect) for the secretaries of legation and embassy, I would rather take a junior clerk to have charge of a division than take one of them for the upper work of the Foreign Office. It frequently happens to me (and I am glad to have the opportunity of saying it, as passing a just enconium upon the junior members of the office), from illness or other causes, to be thrown, in important divisions of the office, upon the assistance of quite junior clerks; and I must say for them that they have never failed me, even though they may not have been in the office above a year. I look upon it that a clerk in the Foreign Office, having had training for a year, if he is worth anything, will be a most valuable assistant to an Under Secretary, and of course, through the Under Secretary, to the Secretary of State.

355. Under the present system, an attaché becomes third secretary in four years, and then enters on the paid service, in which promotion is strictly a matter of seniority?—It is practically so, but not strictly so.

356. He commences with a salary of 150 l. a year as a third secretary?—Yes.

357. And the six attachés appointed during the last six months will, if all their lives be spared, in the course of four years enter on a salary whether there are vacancies occurring or not?—Yes, that was an arrangement which a Committee of the House of Commons was responsible for perhaps more than the Foreign Office.

358. You said in your former evidence that there was a well founded and reasonable expectation on the part of secretaries of legation to become ministers; surely, looking at the present list, you cannot confirm that statement?—Certainly the expectation is very much blighted at present, but should the Committee recommend anything, though they cannot give them promotion, that will make their pecuniary position rather better; I am sure that they will be very much obliged for it, and I on their behalf shall also be very much obliged.

359. What chance is there of one of the 13 third secretaries becoming a minister?—I am afraid that is beyond my calculation.

360. What are the conditions under which a third secretary becomes a second secretary?—He does not become a second secretary until there is a vacancy in the list.

361. And no second secretary is appointed a secretary of legation unless there is a vacancy in that office?—No.

362. What are the special duties of the third secretaries?—The special duties of the third secretaries are those of a junior clerk in the Foreign Office, to make himself generally useful in the mission.

363. Principally copying, I suppose?—Not being employed in a foreign mission I cannot say; but I wish to disabuse the Committee of an impression which seems to exist, that the junior members of either the Foreign Office or the diplomatic service are necessarily mere copyists. The fact is that they have a great deal of other business to do.

364. With regard to the duties of the secretaries of legation, you gave the Committee important information in respect to an arrangement which was made under which the secretaries of legation were required to present reports in respect to industrial matters affecting foreign countries; that arrangement was made in 1856?—Yes.

365. After 1856, I observe you say that "it was determined to utilize the class of second secretaries, not with a view to their reports being sent home and published as the others, but generally to utilize them for the service of the minister in the same manner as the clerks of the Foreign Office are utilized for the service of the Secretary of State, namely, we recommended to the heads of missions to employ the junior members of the mission in working up subjects upon which the minister himself would eventually have to report to the Secretary of State." Now upon that answer it occurs to me to ask, were these second secretaries not utilized before 1856?—They were doubtless utilized; but we recommended a particular course of utilization on account of the training that it would ensure. The original object of the reports of the secretaries of legation was not so much to give general information to the country at large, for that was an after-thought, but to give them habits of application to studies which they might turn to good account, if they advanced to proficiency in them, when they became ministers. And, just in the same manner we recommended to our ministers to give that instruction to the junior members of the missions. We did not know whether they employed them in that manner or not; but it was the duty of the Secretary of State, wishing to improve the service generally, to point out to the minister generally one way in which their services might be utilized. We adopted, with that view, the practice in our own Foreign Office.

366. But would it not be the practice of the minister before 1856, or the year to which you allude, to make use of the second secretaries to work up subjects?—I dare say that it might have been, but there could be no objection to the Secretary of State specially calling attention to the point.

367. It is spoken of in your evidence as a new thing?—I was only speaking of it as an extension of the practice as regards secretaries of legation. I presume that in all times a minister might, if he had seen proper, without waiting for a circular despatch from the Foreign Office, have called upon a secretary or attaché to work up any subject, and I have no doubt that he did so; but that did not render it unnecessary for the Secretary of State, anxious for the general improvement of all the members of the diplomatic service, to point out to the heads of missions that particular mode of utilizing them.

368. Then there was no special ground for the recommendation?—No special ground, but merely the general exercise of what I hope you will consider a proper supervision by the Secretary of State, who was anxious to do his best to educate the junior members of the service.

369. Do these reports of the secretaries of legation come through the heads of missions?—I believe they always do; they do not now come into my hands, from the change in the distribution of the business of the office, but I believe they always do come, and they ought to come, through the heads of missions, who merely forward them.

370. Do you think that it is the practice of the heads of missions to look over and to take the superintendence of the reports of secretaries of legations?—I cannot give an opinion upon the practice, but I naturally suppose that the head of a mission having a report to forward upon the country in which he resides, would not pass on that report without looking at it.

371. But do you believe that they do present it through the heads of missions, and do not send it direct to the Foreign Office?—We have no correspondence with any person connected with a foreign mission, except the head of the mission.

372. I will point out to you the object of my question. In reference to the reports of the secretaries of legations, you were asked, last Monday, whether the second secretaries were not employed in collecting the information for the purpose of those reports; and your reply was, "No; they would very likely assist the secretary of legation, but it is not a part of the duty officially ascribed to him. The second officer of legation would very likely employ a man to assist him, but it would be just a matter of private friendship; I should not consider that it was a duty obligatory upon the second secretary to collect materials for the first secretary"?—My corrected answer to that question is this: "No; they would very likely assist the secretary of legation, but it is not a part of the duty officially prescribed to them; it would be just a matter of private friendship. I should not consider that it was a duty obligatory upon the second secretary to collect materials for the secretary of legation."

373. The question that I wish to ask you upon that is, do you not consider that if these reports are sent through the head of the mission, it ought to be obligatory on the second secretary to assist in getting the information necessary?—No, because the object was that the report should be the report of the secretary of legation, derived from his own observation; if another man gets all the information, he makes that man's report, whose report then it is not. Now, we wished that the secretary of legation should make his own report; but there could be no objection to a secretary of legation saying to his friends sitting beside him, "I want to get this informatian, will you help me in getting it?" But the information has to be worked up by the secretary of legation.

374. But getting the secretary's report is one object; the information of the public at home is another object?—Certainly.

375. Is it not desirable that that information for the public at home should be obtained in as general and as efficient a manner as possible?—And I apprehend that the secretary of legation does obtain it in the most efficient manner.

376. Would it not seem likely that if the second secretary assisted the first secretary it would be still better done?—It would cease then to be the report of the secretary of legation.

377. The public however would have better information?—I do not say it would.

378. Do you not think that it would be an advantage to the public service if promotion depended upon the character, ability, and attention to duties of the secretaries of legation?—I apprehend it does.

379. I am very much mistaken if I did not gather from you that the promotion of attachés through the ranks of third secretaries, second secretaries, and up to secretaries of legation, was a matter practically of seniority?—Yes; but my answer meant that if a man was decidedly superior to others it would still be in the option of the Secretary of State to promote him over the heads of the others.

380. I think I rightly understood you to say that a third secretary never became a second secretary until there was a vacancy in the list of second secretaries, and that a second secretary never became a secretary of legation until there was a vacancy in the list of secretaries of legation?—But you did not understand me to say that an attaché, who was unworthy of being promoted to be a second secretary, would still be promoted to that position.

381. But in reference to the general ordinary character of people in the service, the practice is that there is no promotion dependent upon extraordinary merit through those grades?—The other day we did promote a man, or rather confer an appointment upon a man in consequence of the extraordinary merit which he had shown.

382. Was that an appointment to a higher grade over seniors?—No; it was one of our own clerks, who was made per saltum, a second secretary.

383. I am anxious to keep to the point of the promotion of attachés and second and third secretaries, and I think I gathered from your reply that, practically, promotion is a matter entirely of seniority, and not dependent upon especial merit on the part of the second and third secretaries?—

All I can say is, that if the ability of a man were so marked that it would justify the Secretary of State in promoting him over the heads of those above him, he might so promote him, and there is nothing to prevent his so promoting him; but the question rather implies, I think, disparagement of the members of our diplomatic service; probably it may not be so intended, but practically it really does imply it; I do not like answering such questions, for I tell you fairly, I will not admit that any person in our diplomatic service is undeserving of consideration.

384. Am I to understand, then, that you do not think it would be an advantage to the public service if promotion depended upon the character, ability, and attention to duties of the secretaries of legation?—I say it does depend upon those things to a certain extent. If a man were not deserving of promotion, he would not receive it.

385. But practically they are promoted according to seniority?—They deserve it in those cases.

386. You stated on Monday last that you objected to Ministers abroad having to report upon the conduct and character of secretaries; but do not you think that they can judge of men constantly under their own eyes better than you can do hundreds of miles away?—The reason I gave for my objection was that I think that the practice of surveillance implied by those confidential reports would be destructive of the harmony of every mission. Of course it would be the duty of a minister abroad to call attention to any serious irregularity that was taking place, or any systematic want of attention, and of course due heed would be given to what he said, and in fact I have known myself that changes have been influenced by circumstances of that kind; but as a general rule nothing would be so destructive to the peace and goodwill which ought to prevail in a mission as the apprehension or the idea that things prejudicial to an attaché might be said behind his back.

387. You said, speaking of the Foreign Office, "We have the means of taking the measure of foreign secretaries," but are not those means necessarily limited?—No, almost all our people know each other, and if any person went decidedly wrong, we could hardly fail to hear it. In my own case, since I was Under Secretary, circumstances have been mentioned to me respecting persons employed abroad, indeed twice that has happened to me, and on both those occasions I gave a friendly hint that such things had better be put an end to. It is much better that supervision and control should be exercised in that manner than by any formal and confidential reports on the part of the heads of missions. The information in the cases I allude to was given to me unasked for, and was not sought for by me. I never wish to hear those things myself, because I know how destructive it is to the good of any service that those little stories should be circulated and attended to.

388. But does not your answer amount to this, that the means you have of taking the measure of foreign secretaries are such that you are obliged to trust reports brought to you casually?—Observations may be made by travellers as to what is going on in missions.

389. Is that a desirable mode of forming an opinion of the character, acquirements, and ability of secretaries abroad, to take talk from travellers?—I think it is a very good test, and you acquire a much better knowledge of the character of a man from the incidental habits of his life, than you would derive from any formal reports. It is a very difficult thing for a minister to write a report on a man's character. After all, it comes very much to what happens in my own case. It is my duty, of course, to the Secretary of State, and to the public service, when a case of promotion in the office is before us, to consider whether the person who ought to be promoted is deserving of it. It is at times one of the most disagreeable and most anxious duties that any man can be called upon to perform; and it has been my very painful duty, several times, to have to state to the Secretary of State that, for the reasons which I have given him, I thought that the promotion should either be deferred, or be stopped altogether. And I speak, too, from personal knowledge of the matter; for I never felt more pained in my life than when it happened to another clerk in the Foreign Office and myself, many years ago, to be promoted over the heads of seniors in our office. I did what I could to prevent it happening in my own case; I was overruled, and I was promoted; but it was a very sad and painful history.

390. But do not you think that it adds very much to the efficiency of the service in the Foreign Office, that the clerks depend upon the good opinion of their superiors, under whose eyes they are working for advancement, instead of upon the decision of people elsewhere?—There is no question in the case of decision elsewhere. Of course the efficiency of men in the Foreign Office I am able to judge of, because I am in constant intercourse with them But I may also say, that I never, in those cases, act upon my own opinion alone; I prefer to distrust, in a matter of that kind, my own opinion; my colleague knows, as a matter of course, everything of the kind, and I generally ask an opinion as to the ability of a man from those engaged in the current business of the office with him.

391. Your objection to allowing the heads of missions to have a similar power over their subordinates is, that you think that there would be a suspicion of favouritism?—No; the reason why I object to it is, that those confidential reports of the character of the men would be very prejudicial to the harmony of a mission. But I think, also, that if the head of a mission knew that a member of the mission was, either from his character or from his attainments, inefficient or unsatisfactory for public service, it would be his duty to mention it to the Secretary of State.

392. But do you think that there would be any more likelihood of suspicion of favouritism in an action of that kind on the part of a minister abroad, than there is in any action on your own part, or on the part of any other head of a department at home?—I cannot speak to what would happen, in that respect, as regards a minister abroad; that is a question upon which I can give no opinion.

393. Would it not be likely, at all events, to promote due subordination and industry, on the part of secretaries, if they looked up to the ministers as having a voice in their promotion?—That, again, is a question upon which I can give no opinion. I do not think that any members of the missions require that incentive to do their duty properly.

Rt. Hon. E. Hammond.

14 March 1870.

394. I will just refer again to Lord Cowley's letter to which I have already called your attention; he states this: "If it were possible to introduce any system by which the junior members would feel that their promotion depended to a certain extent on their performing their duties to the satisfaction of their chief, an authority, which is sometimes wanted, would be placed in the hands of the latter; for instance, were a chief obliged by his instructions to furnish a half-yearly report to the Foreign Office as to his satisfaction with his subordinates, it is obvious that a hint from him when necessary respecting any irregularity or carelessness he may remark, would carry greater weight with it than when, as now, the only remedy is in a spontaneous complaint to the Secretary of State, for the penalty would be certain were the warning to be neglected; nor would there be any danger of an abuse of this half-yearly report, since any party considering himself wronged by it would have an appeal to your Lordship's office. On the other hand, some certainty should exist that favourable reports would ensure, under ordinary circumstances, promotion according to seniority." I gather you do not agree with that?—That is Lord Cowley's opinion; I do not agree with it, and I cannot endorse it.

395. Have not the Foreign Office had complaints from Ministers abroad of want of control over their subordinates?—As far as I remember, complaint has come before me, that in some places our attachés did not go enough into society to make themselves of that use to the mission of which they might be otherwise; but speaking generally, I should say that I have had no complaint of want of control; but my experience of the office is a long one, and it is very hard to say positively that the thing might not have happened once or twice in the course of 40 years.

396. There is in the Report of the Committee of 1861, a letter from Lord Lyons to Lord John Russell in reply to the circular issued in 1860, which alludes to this question: he says, "A chief in the British diplomatic service has very small means of enforcing discipline. A sense of duty and propriety, and I may add, gentlemanlike habits and manners, appear generally to suffice to make the subordinates respectful to their chief, and to induce them to give a fair share of their time and attention to their official duties. In a gross case of insubordination, misconduct, or negligence, the chief would, I suppose, have the resource of reporting the offender to the Secretary of State. But unless such a report drew down upon the culprit some very severe mark of displeasure, its effect would be to increase rather than diminish insubordination. His being merely removed to another post might be a reward rather than a punishment. If such were supposed to be the only probable result, a complaint to the Foreign Office would be a most ineffectual weapon in the hands of the chief so unlucky as to be stationed at a post not regarded as a pleasant residence. Probably the most effectual means of giving a more thorough control over the attachés would be to make their promotion in a greater degree dependent upon the approval or disapproval of their chiefs. Custom has, I think, rendered the control of the chiefs over the secretaries much less than would be necessary if the secretaries were more regularly employed in the daily work of the Legation?"—Half of that is speculation; but it is to be noted that Lord Lyons begins by stating what neutralises everything else that he says afterwards. He says, "That as a general rule they all behave very well," and then he goes on to speculate upon what should be done in case they behaved badly, and what corrective should be applied to that.

397. The gist of the matter is, that he complains of the existence of insubordination?—No; I do not think that he goes to the extent of complaining of the existence of insubordination; he only speculates upon what would be done in cases of insubordination. Of course, if a man is insubordinate, there is the remedy which he states; he could report him to the Secretary of State.

398. Then your impression is, that Lord Lyons in sending this report to Lord Russell, was recommending a remedy for entirely problematical evils which had not come under his notice?—I certainly think so. He and all other ambassadors may write opinions and speculate upon what they should do if things were otherwise than they are.

399. I may fairly ask you whether Lord Lyons, having been an ambassador, and having had great experience as the head of missions, may not be considered by the Committee a very proper authority to rely upon in the question of what is necessary to secure the due efficiency of the service?—Of course I have no right to give an opinion as to what the Committee should consider a proper authority.

400. Has it not come under the knowledge of the Foreign Office, that there have frequently been disputes between the heads of missions and subordinates?—One may have heard of it as one hears of thousands of things, but if the case were to come before us of a dispute between the head of a mission and a subordinate, it would be of course judged and dealt with by the Secretary of State for the time being; and even if I could do so, I should not think it quite right to rip up old sores, and enter into painful details for very little practical object; you can hardly judge of what has happened in former times, without having before you all the circumstances connected with the case.

401. But the efficiency of a mission must necessarily depend upon the subordination of the members to the chief; and I must, therefore, renew these questions to elicit from you whether it is not a fact that the present system is not sufficient to secure that subordination?—I suppose that few people can judge better of the efficiency of a mission than those whose duty it is to control it, who are the Secretary of State and the Under Secretaries of State for Foreign Affairs; we can tell very well if the business of a mission is conducted properly or not.

402. Was it not notorious that when Lord Stratford de Redcliffe was at Constantinople, there were considerable misunderstandings in that mission?—I decline to answer any questions on that subject.

403. I will now take you to a question with regard to the changes which occur in the second and third secretaries, from one post to another. Mr. Stanley asked you this question on Monday last: "Transfers have been made very much more of late years; that is to say, persons who have been secretaries of legation, and so on, have been transferred from one place to another, much more often than was formerly the case; is not that so?"

o?"—I cannot exactly tell how Mr. Stanley put his question, but my answer to that question was, "They" (meaning secretaries of legation) "have only been transferred as vacancies have arisen." The next question is, "It has not become the practice of the office to transfer the junior members of legation more than was formerly the custom?" To which I answered, "The Committee of 1861 were of opinion that a junior should not remain more than two years at a place, and so far as I understand, that seems now to be the general rule."

404. I understand in your reply to the question which the honourable Member put to you, you imply that there has not been an increased practice of changing the junior members of the legation from one post to another since the Report of the Committee of 1861?—No, quite the reverse.

405. Then there has been an increase in the practice?—There was no rule laid down before 1861; there has been a rule laid down since 1861, that the junior members should, as a general rule, be transferred after two years.

406. But I am now referring to the practice; was the practice of transference before 1861 as frequent as it has been since 1861, since which time there has been a rule of the service that it should take place after two years?—I am unable to answer that.

407. The travelling expenses of these junior secretaries of legation are paid by the country, are they not?—They are now paid by the country.

408. Is there not a disadvantage in the constant change of junior members every two years from one legation to another?—I perfectly agree in the opinion of the Committee of 1861 that it is advantageous that it should take place.

409. Every two years?—Every two years, or thereabouts.

410. Does not your argument in favour of the change arise from the present constitution of the service, and would it not be removed, supposing the practice was that secretaries of legation were appointed to certain missions, and were expected to serve the public at those missions?—Certainly; but secretaries of legation are appointed to missions with that expectation.

411. Do not you exchange secretaries of legations every two years?—No; second secretaries are liable to be exchanged every two years.

412. I am speaking of the juniors, the second and third secretaries of legation. Supposing that they were appointed to certain missions, and were expected to remain there in the public service, so as to become fully acquainted with the duties of that mission, then you would not see any advantage in their being removed every two years up and down the world, would you?—I think that it would be very disadvantageous to the general interest of the diplomatic service to confine men to a particular place. It is a great object that they should move about in the different courts and different countries, where they enlarge their minds, extend their sphere of observation, and qualify themselves by general knowledge for the proper discharge of any duties that may be imposed upon them. There is nothing worse, I should say, for a young man than to remain stationary at any one particular mission. If he is to take a general view (as we trust our diplomatists do take a general view) of European politics, it is much better that he should practically be acquainted with the policy of the different courts by residing at them, than that he should have his view limited to one narrow sphere in which he has been brought up all his official life.

413. But is it not practically of great importance that the members of the legation should be well acquainted with the circumstances of the country in which their mission is placed?—The change is never such as to apply to a whole mission at once; the change is only partial in a mission. If you had two second secretaries at a mission you would not move them both at the same time, in all probability. The same would, as a general rule, hold good as to a minister remaining stationary always at the same place. The objection to a minister always remaining in the same place is that he is liable to become a partisan of the Government, and that very much detracts from his general utility.

414. You are aware that there was evidence given by Lord Cowley before the Diplomatic Committee in 1861 to the effect that, in consequence of the changes which had taken place in the members of the legation, when anything of an extraordinary character arose, he could not get the information that he required?—Yes; but you will allow me to say that you cannot reason from the embassy at Paris to every other embassy. The embassy at Paris, from the mass of the correspondence carried on, resembles the Foreign Office pretty closely. As a general rule, the embassy at Paris has copies of every official paper of any consequence which comes into the Foreign Office, and therefore there is a great mass of correspondence there; and it is very desirable, in fact it is necessary, that there should be a librarian there, and, of course, it is part of the duty of the librarian there, as it is part of the duty of the librarian in our office, to supply information upon events which have long since past by. For the purposes of this Committee I have been obliged to tax our librarian to work up information for me, which has gone many, many years back. And so it is at Paris; whereas with a comparatively small amount of correspondence a minister, or those attached to him, can get at any matter very easily. With a very large embassy like Paris, it is, of course, very desirable to have a person who has the same knowledge of the correspondence of that chancery as our librarian has in the Foreign Office; in a smaller mission, where the register covers a smaller number of papers, you can very easily run it through.

415. I may say that the questions which I have troubled you with have been very much directed to the line suggested by Lord Stanley (now Lord Derby) in 1853 in the House of Commons, and I will just state his opinion in relation to the diplomatic service, and ask your opinion as to that. Lord Stanley said, "He believed the whole system by which diplomacy was made an exclusive service might safely be abolished, and that a system analogous to that adopted in the public offices at home might be established. His belief was that the knowledge which the training was supposed to confer on the superior diplomatic servants with regard to the details of diplomatic business might be easily supplied by attaching to the missions abroad persons who should act in the same capacity as the clerks of our public offices at home, who should be previously trained to the service, and whose duty it should be to furnish all the necessary professional knowledge which such superior diplomatic ministers might require, and of which, coming new to the business, they must necessarily be deficient. By having such a body of men to render that assistance, the door of the diplomatic service might be thrown open, and they might then appoint any public officer to the higher ranks of diplomacy whose merits and general acquirements in other respects might entitle him to the appointment;" you do not agree with that?—Considering that the present Lord Derby was my chief for two or three years, and that he is available to be examined by the Committee, I would rather that you would ascertain from him whether he still entertains that view than give my opinion upon it. It would be very unbecoming in me in the relation in which I stood to Lord Derby, to comment in any way on his opinion; and Lord Derby will be able, I have no doubt, if called before the Committee, to explain to them the reasons why, 13 years having passed from the time that he gave that opinion, when he became Secretary of State, he did not give effect to it. A person may very easily give an abstract opinion; when he comes to put it into practice, it is quite a different thing.

Rt. Hon. E. Hammond.

416. I have now to ask you, in reference to first and second class missions, and I wish to know, in appointments to missions, what is the general rule observed by the Foreign Office; is the Senior First Secretary ordinarily appointed?—I do not feel that I can answer that question. The appointment to missions is the exclusive province of the Secretary of State; and I do not feel that it would be seemly in me to go into the question how he exercises his judgment in those matters. I cannot answer any question as to the motive which would lead to a Secretary of State appointing any particular man; it would be very unbecoming if I did.

417. According to the Return which was presented at the opening of the Session, several second-class missions were raised to first-class missions in October 1862; can you give the Committee any reason for that change?—It was done by the direction of the Secretary of State.

418. It is entirely in the hands of the Secretary of State?—Yes, it was so at that time.

419. And it carries an advance of pension from 900 l. to 1,300 l. a year?—Yes.

420. Can the Foreign Secretary, at his discretion, reduce these first-class missions again to second-class missions?—Certainly before the last Act of Parliament (32 & 33 Vict. c. 43) was passed he could have done so; I cannot quite remember now how the Act of Parliament bears upon that particular question of reduction. It certainly bears upon the elevation, but whether it bears upon the reduction, I cannot remember. Taking the question as applying antecedently to the Act of Parliament of last Session, the Secretary of State, in the same way that he had made a second-class mission into a first-class mission, might, if he had seen occasion, have reduced it again to a second class.

421. Three first-class missions have been raised into embassies since 1861, Russia, Prussia, and Austria; can you give any reasons to justify that change?—I think that I can give the Committee very sufficient reasons for it; I expected the question to be asked of me, and therefore I took the liberty of putting down on paper, as I did the other day, the answer I wished to give in the first instance, subject, of course, to any questions. The advantage of the privilege that an ambassador enjoys of direct access to the sovereign, is too valuable to be lightly renounced. I have known it on various occasions successfully resorted to for the settlement of questions which threatened to lead to serious consequences. We must not assume that similar questions may not arise hereafter. For the convenience of this Committee I have had a list made of the principal political events during the last 30 years, all more or less such as to cause anxiety: I will put it in. The French Minister for Foreign Affairs said, not long ago, in the Chamber, with great truth, "This conflagration which is called war, has within the last ten years been burning in the United States, in Germany, in Italy, in Spain, and we all know that fires even when most nearly extinguished, leave smouldering traces and smoking ruins which a spark may kindle again into a flame." But no complications can arise among foreign nations which do not more or less affect English interests. Our material and industrial interests require that foreign markets should not be closed against us as they might be, if such complications were not timely dealt with. Our trade alone with foreign countries, not to mention the colonial trade with them, amounts to about 500,000,000 l. a year, and the tonnage of our shipping, entered and cleared, engaged in it, amounts to above 22,000,000 tons. It would therefore be a short-sighted and unwise economy to deprive ourselves by the suppression of our embassies at the great courts, of the means which their maintenance provides for exerting in the interest of peace a salutary influence in the politics of Europe. There never was a time when that influence was more appreciated or more sought after; but even if it might be said, that in that respect a diplomatic agent with the rank of a minister, could do the work as well as an ambassador, and that for the sake of economy the privilege of direct audience of a foreign sovereign might be waved for all our representatives, yet at courts where other great powers maintain ambassadors, Great Britain, if she were to reduce her embassies to missions, would voluntarily accept a lower place, and would be treated accordingly. But if it were also said, that the policy of his Government and not his diplomatic status, is what gives weight to a diplomatic agent,—while the same argument might be used in support of merely maintaining at a foreign court a chargé d'affaires, or even a consul general,—the fact is that the inconvenience of the British representative being of a low rank was recently so severely felt at Paris, that we were actually obliged to give the rank of minister to the secretary of embassy while acting in charge of the embassy during the absence of the ambassador, instead of that of chargé d'affaires, which he had previously held at the French court. As regards the expenditure for the diplomatic service of this country, I desire to point out to the Committee that since the year 1843, when the salaries and allowances and pensions of the diplomatic body as then maintained, were first brought within the limit declared by the Act of Parliament of 1832 to be sufficient for them, namely, 180,000 l. a year, the expenditure on those accounts has never been exceeded, but has, on the contrary, generally fallen considerably short of the appointed sum; though in the period that has elapsed since the year 1843, namely, 26 years, the expenditure for every other ther branch of the public service has enormously ncreased; and the successive Secretaries of State or Foreign Affairs, so far from being justly bnoxious to the charge of extravagance for iplomatic expenditure which has been imputed o them, have a right to claim credit for having o administered the fund entrusted by Parliament o the Crown in order to provide for it, as to have net the charge without exceeding the allotted provision, notwithstanding the great increase in he cost of living abroad, amounting, as the Committee will see, on examining the volume that I have laid before them, in some instances to 25, 50, or even considerably more per cent., as stated by unbiassed and independent testimony, which has taken place during the period, and which has rendered it impossible in most, if not in all cases, for our diplomatic servants of whatever rank to provide for their current and necessary expenditure without largely drawing on their private means.

422. I gather from your statement that practically, so far as the difference between the position of an ambassador and a minister is concerned, the right to demand an audience of the Sovereign is enjoyed by the ambassador, while the minister can only ask it as a favour?—He has no right to it.

423. But practically, I suppose a minister finds no difficulty in obtaining an audience from the Sovereign if he wishes it?—That I cannot say; but I may be allowed to say that there might be times when a Sovereign would rather avoid a personal interview with a foreign minister, and those being critical times, he might evade that as regards a minister, but he could not evade it as regards an ambassador.

424. But in countries where there is a responsible ministry, is it not the custom, and on the whole desirable for the communication of the ambassador or minister to be made to the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, or other members of the Government?—It is customary, and of course preferable, but critical emergencies may arise upon which the fate of nations may depend, and in those emergencies a direct appeal to the Sovereign may avert calamities as to which no person could say to what extent they would proceed.

425. Do you believe that the interests of this country abroad have suffered in any case in consequence of our having a minister instead of an ambassador?—I cannot answer the question you have put, but I can answer the converse of the question, and say that I not only believe, but know that the interests of the country have been materially advanced by having an ambassador.

426. Are you aware that the United States have no ambassador?—I am perfectly aware of that.

427. Do you suppose that their diplomatic action suffers in consequence?—The diplomatic action of the United States in Europe is quite a different thing from our own. Events may occur in Europe which may imperil our position in every way (I will not say to what extent, but I will leave the Committee to imagine to what extent), but may not affect the United States of America. As I pointed out the other day, when the interests of the United States are concerned, they do not hesitate to go even to greater expense than ourselves in providing for their diplomatic body.

428. The United States have important interests occasionally pending between themselves and European courts, have they not?—They have important interests, but not of that character which is involved in the political relations of European nations between themselves.

429. But have they not very important interests in which the people of America generally, and the government of America are deeply involved?—I presume they have.

430. For instance, in the case of the unfortunate differences that have arisen between America and this country, you would, I presume, assume that the diplomatic action in those cases was as important as it could be in any similar cases occurring between two European nations?—The answer to that is, that we certainly have very important questions pending between ourselves and the United States; but in this country the direct influence of the Sovereign upon foreign politics is not of the same nature as it is abroad; and no ambassador within my memory has seen occasion to appeal directly to the Sovereign as against the Government, in order to influence the decisions of this country in regard to political matters.

431. But I gather that at all events you do not consider that the diplomatic action of the United States suffers in consequenece of their not having ambassadors?—It may not suffer, because the questions that they have to treat diplomatically are quite of a different character from question treated between European courts and ourselves. The questions which the United States have to treat on with foreign governments are direct questions between themselves and the foreign governments. Now the questions to which I alluded were not so much or so necessarily merely direct questions between England and one Continental power; but the influence which might be brought to bear by England upon one Continental power might be directed to influence the relations of that power with another foreign country. There is a wide distinction between the United States dealing with one power for their own interest, and England, or France, or Russia, or Prussia, or Austria, dealing for common interest with different powers of Europe.

432. It is the difference between what is called the principle of intervention and the principle of non-intervention in foreign diplomacy, is it not?—No, I do not call it intervention. A word spoken in good season does not come within the common definition of intervention. When we use the word intervention, we mean something going beyond a word in good season.

433. Is it not the fact, that the main considerations affecting this question of nominal rank have reference to the precedence conferred by it in foreign courts?—Not to precedence, but to the power of obtaining access to the sovereign in foreign courts.

434. But is not precedence affected by mere title without reference to the relative importance of the duties performed by the members of the legations?—Of course an ambassador will walk out before a minister, according to the rules laid down at the Congress of Vienna.

435. And so far as precedence is concerned, it would be secured simply by changing the title of minister to that of ambassador?—Precedence would be, but the mere walking before another is nothing but child's play.

436. But it would be secured by merely changing the title?—I should hope that at this present day no person in this country ever troubles himself about precedence.

437. I am afraid that I could show you, in documents connected with the foreign service, that the matter of precedence has sometimes been treated as important?—I believe there is a tradition that many years ago there was a fight in Parliament-street between two ambassadors and their respective suites, which arose out of a question of precedence.

438. Is there not in this book with which you have furnished us a careful account of the questions of precedence?—That has all been settled by the Vienna Protocol; but it is a very immaterial thing whether a man walks out before another or not.

439. It is considered material abroad, is it not?—Not in political relations. The rule of the Congress of Vienna, to which you allude, was made to settle the question of one man walking before another, and to prevent the occurrence of distressing events like these I have alluded to, such as two ambassadors entering into personal conflict in the streets.

440. I am very glad to hear (for I suppose I must take your answer to mean) that you do not think that the mere matter of precedence as between ministers and ambassadors is a matter of any importance in foreign courts?—The mere matter of precedence is not of any importance; but if you mean to deduce from that that the ambassadorial rank, which carries with it precedence, is unimportant, I differ from you.

441. I do not deduce anything except the fact, that the mere kind of precedence arising from a particular title is not a matter of any importance in your judgment?—It is one of those things which seems to me so thoroughly insignificant, that I have never troubled myself to think about it.

442. But, unfortunately, though the duties of an ambassador and minister are practically the same, their salaries are different?—There is a difference in that respect, certainly; and that, perhaps, depends upon the circumstance that the style of living in a court where ambassadors are maintained, is more expensive than at others; for instance, at Paris the style of living is very expensive, more expensive than in Switzerland. With regard to the capitals of Russia and Prussia, and Austria, as between them and Paris, I believe there is competition, I do not mean of ambassadorial, but of local extravagance.

443. But the fact is, that when Russia, which was formerly an embassy, was reduced to a mission, the salary of the minister was reduced, and when it was raised again to an embassy, the salary of the ambassador was raised from that which the minister had enjoyed?—Yes.

444. The fact is that, practically, when there is a change from minister to ambassador, there is a change of salary?—Yes, the salary is increased, but not without some equivalent advantage to the country represented, the equivalent advantage being much more valuable than the difference of the salary, 2,000*l.* or 3,000*l.* a year, or whatever it may be; because by increasing the rank of your minister you gain power of access to an autocratic Sovereign, whose dictum is much more valuable to us in the councils and policy of his country than the sum which we pay to secure means of access to his person.

445. But that would not apply to a constitutional Sovereign?—Do not put upon me to define constitutional Sovereigns, because I should have very great difficulty, and probably the Committee would have very great difficulty, in bracketing, with a view to any such definition, European Sovereigns, or any Sovereigns, with Her Majesty.

446. I must again trouble you on this question. I understood you to say that the mere title of an ambassador in place of a minister would give a man a right to communicate personally with the despotic Sovereign to whom you are alluding?—Yes.

447. That right in no way depends upon the amount of salary attached to the office of ambassador being higher than that attached to the office of minister?—No; only if you give a man a higher position at court, it naturally carries with it higher expenditure. An ambassador must live in a court on the footing of those who are the principal people at the court.

448. He must live in greater style than a minister plenipotentiary, must he?—I should think he must. That is the principle by which all diplomatic salaries, not only in our own country, but in other countries, are regulated. I have not looked at the question with that view, but I very much doubt whether you would not find that in all other countries the salaries given by them to their ambassadors are much higher in proportion than they would give to their first-class ministers.

449. You stated in your examination the other day that ambassadors had greater expenses than ministers; that tradesmen, for instance, charge an ambassador more than a minister?—I do say that; and I may say that when on that day I left this Committee and got to my own office, a foreign minister at this court called upon me, and I described to him what I had stated to the Committee, namely, that a foreign diplomatist was always charged more than a residential inhabitant of the place; and his answer was instantly, "Yes, 25 per cent. more." And then I went on with the further question, "Do you think that the English minister is charged more than his colleagues?" and his reply was, "I do." He named to me several courts at which he had resided as minister, having been long a diplomatist, and he said that unquestionably the diplomatic body was charged at least 25 per cent more than others, and that an English diplomatist was charged more than his colleagues, because it was considered that an Englishman must necessarily be rolling in wealth. I put the same question to two other foreign ministers; and without going into the exact proportion, the answer was the same, that, as a general rule, a diplomatist in a foreign country would be charged more than ordinary persons.

450. That is not the point that I am addressing my examination to; we are now making inquiries, first of all, as to the advantage of having an ambassador in place of a minister plenipotentiary; and secondly, as to the necessity of paying an ambassador more than a minister plenipotentiary; and you, as I understood, stated as a reason for paying ambassadors more than ministers plenipotentiary, that ambassadors were charged by tradesmen more than ministers were charged?—I meant that the diplomatic body generally were charged more than others.

451. Then, in point of fact, the circumstance that a man is called an ambassador is no reason why he should have a higher salary than if he is called called a minister?—No; but in all probability a tradesman would estimate the wealth of his customer by the rank that he held.

452. I will put it in this way; do you suppose, for instance, that Lord Lyons, living at the embassy at Paris as minister plenipotentiary, would necessarily have less expenses than he would have as ambassador there?— That is a question that I cannot possibly answer, and I feel less competent to do so, because I know a man who, as an attaché, spent, I believe, very nearly as much as a person at the head of a minor mission.

453. Leaving out of consideration the question whether the rank of an ambassador leads directly to expenditure, do you not consider that the salaries attached to our principal missions are too high?—They are perfectly inadequate, and that was the opinion of the Committee in 1861. You will remember the recommendation which that Committee made, that the Secretary of State should revise the salaries of the greater missions with a view to considering whether they were adequate to meet the greatly increased expenditure of living at the principal European capitals.

454. In consequence of the increased charges of living?—Yes. If you take the charges of living as they were in 1851, and compare them with what they are now, you will find that, in the great majority of cases, the maximum of 1851 increased by the per-centage of increase which all prices on the Continent have undergone, fall very little short of our present rates of salaries. I believe that none of our ministers can live upon what they receive from the public. And it has has come to my knowledge to-day, that even in the United States great difficulty is found now in obtaining proper persons for foreign missions, from the inadequacy of the salaries which they would receive; and two representatives of the United States were named to me as having been recently obliged to throw up their missions because they could not live upon the salaries assigned to them. In one of those cases I believe the salary was higher than the salary assigned to our representative at the same place.

455. I am referring in my present questions to principal missions. I take it for granted that no salary of any minister from America comes up at all in amount to the salaries paid to our ambassadors in our principal European missions?—No; but I took out the other day, in anticipation of a question of that kind, a comparison between the salaries of American Secretaries of State and American heads of mission, which has a little bearing upon the question, because it was stated in Parliament (I think by yourself) that our ambassador at Paris had twice the salary of our Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Now, on that subject I may say that the salary of the Secretary of State for the United States (whose duties, I need not tell you, are far more comprehensive than those of our Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, because he is the only Secretary of State in the United States) is 8,000 dollars a-year, representing a sterling sum of 1,643 l. The salaries of their two first-class missions (they only have two, namely, Paris and London), are each 17,500 dollars, representing the sum of 3,591 l.; being more than double the salary enjoyed by the Secretary of State of the United States. I dare say that our ambassador at Paris would not object to accept that relative proportion between his salary and the salary of the Secretary of State in England. I am perfectly certain that the ambassadors at Vienna, Berlin, and at Petersburg, would accept it very gladly. Then of 10 second-class missions of the United States, the salary is 12,000 dollars a year each, representing 2,464 l., which is one-third more than the salary of the Secretary of State in the United States. Perhaps our second-class missions would be very glad to receive the same proportion; it would give them, perhaps, a couple of thousand pounds more than they have at present. Then the salary of the 22 third-class missions of the United States is 7,500 dollars, that is 1,540 l.; only 100 l. a year short of that of the Secretary of State.

456. That is merely a comparison as between the salaries of ministers and Secretaries of State?—I am stating these facts in regard to what you said in the House the other day, and I think I may fairly mention them in reply.

457. The fact still remains, that the salary of the minister of the United States in Paris is less than one-third of the salary paid to our ambassador?—Yes, it certainly is, and the American diplomatists complain most bitterly of the inadequacy of the salaries assigned to them. Moreover, the American diplomatists, certainly without any impeachment of their hospitality, do not live on the footing in foreign countries on which English diplomatists and the diplomatists of other foreign countries are expected to live. I have always heard it said that it is a very painful position in which an American minister is placed in a foreign country, that while he is always well received wherever he may go, unless he has large private means of his own, he can make no return for the civility and attention shown him; and that is, I must say, a most humiliating position for a person holding the rank and moving in the station of a minister of the United States, and I believe that it is felt very severely. I wish, before the Committee adjourn, to state that I am here by the direction of the Secretary of State to give every possible information, and to express his desire that the Committee should sift the subject to the bottom. There is not a single thing which we wish to conceal.

The Right Honourable EDMUND HAMMOND, called in; and further Examined.

Rt. Hon. E. Hammond.

17 March 1870.

458. Mr. Rylands.] I SHALL trouble you, if you please, in reference to Question 417, which was put to you last Monday. I asked you, "According to the Return which was presented at the opening of the Session, several second class missions were raised to first class missions in October 1862; can you give the Committee any reason for that change?" and your reply was, "It was done by the direction of the Secretary of State." Then I asked, "Is it entirely in the hands of the Secretary of State?" You replied, "Yes." Then I asked, "And it carries an advance of pension from 900*l.* to 1,300*l.* a year?" to which you replied that it did. Now, I wish to ask whether there was any note or memorandum of the Secretary of State giving the reason for the change of these second class missions to first class missions?—I am not aware that there was. It is not the practice of our office to make a long minute, like Treasury minutes, upon any transactions that occur at the office. The probability is, that nothing more was said than that such a mission would be thenceforward classed as a first class mission.

459. You do not suppose that there would be any minute setting forth reasons for the change?—No.

460. Was there any communication with thy Treasury on the subject before the change of the rank of these missions?—There was no need of communication at that time, because all such regulations were made by the Secretary of State acting on behalf of the Queen, to whom a sum was entrusted by Parliament in 1832, for the diplomatic service. We were not then obliged to ask the consent of the Treasury to changes of that kind, or to the grant of a pension. The form in which a pension used to be granted was, that the Queen had been pleased to signify her commands that such and such a pension should be granted.

461. In fact, the pension was paid out of the 180,000*l.* a year from the Consolidated Fund, and did not come under the cognizance of the Treasury at all?—It came under the cognizance, but not under the control of the Treasury.

462. But now, in the event of any change of rank of this character affecting pensions, it would require the sanction of the Treasury?—With respect to pay, as well as pension, the sanction of the Treasury is required. The pay being on the Estimate cannot be increased without the consent of the Treasury. The Act of Parliament of last Session, 32 & 33 Vict. c. 43, has a provision about pensions, and, if you please, I will read the clause on the subject; it is the 13th clause. "It shall be lawful for Her Majesty, from time to time, to determine the foreign states, the envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary at which are thereafter to be deemed on first and second class missions respectively for the purposes of a pension under this Act. Such determination shall be signified in writing under the hand of the Secretary of State, to the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, and shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament within 14 days after the signing thereof, if Parliament be then sitting, and if Parliament be not then sitting, within 14 days after the commencement of the next Session." (I conceive, though it is not exactly expressed in terms, that the Treasury, if they were dissatisfied with the change, would be empowered to remonstrate.) "The arrangement existing at the commencement of this Act as to such first and second class missions shall, until and except so far as altered under the provisions of this section, continue in force for the purposes of a pension under this Act." Consequently the present arrangement of first and second class missions is now an arrangement by Act of Parliament, which validates the existing state of things.

463. With regard to the expenditure upon which I troubled you with questions last Monday, I presume that a very considerable portion of the expenditure of ambassadors or ministers abroad has reference to what may be called the cost of representation; the position that they occupy as representing this country in foreign capitals?—Yes.

464. The mere living in the style of gentlemen of rank in a foreign capital would not require, would it, the large expenditure to which you allude as being the justification of the high salaries?—Perhaps I can give you a better idea of the case by adverting to the practice in in some foreign Governments. I believe that in the Government of Italy, for example, the ministers are classified; and that a minister of the first rank receives as pay, irrespective of his place of residence, so much, and for the expenses of his maintenance so much. I had in my hand the other day (but I cannot lay my hand upon it again), some Parliamentary Paper, I think it was, in which it was proposed, a great number of years ago, to regulate the salaries of our missions upon a similar basis; but my recollection (I am speaking only very vaguely) is, that the ambassador at Paris, under that regulation, would have received rather more than 5,000 l. a year as pocket money, you may say, and very much the same sum of money for the purpose of representation.

465. I understand, at all events, that it is the fact, that in judging of the expenditure of an ambassador or Minister abroad you consider that beyond the ordinary expenditure of a nobleman or gentleman in his position, he would have to expend a certain extra amount attaching to the position which he occupies as the representative of this country?—Yes.

466. In order to save time, perhaps you will allow me to read a reply of Lord Palmerston's before the Select Committee of 1850 on Official Salaries, in which, in allusion to the high salary given to the ambassador at Paris, and speaking of the reasons for it, he says, "Then France is the country with which our relations are the most important, and in order to put those relations upon a good footing, it is necessary that the representative of England there should live in a way that involves a good deal of representation and of hospitality; and the number of English who frequent Paris, and who expect more or less to be entertained by the ambassador, is greater than in any other continental town;" I dare say you accept that as a fair expression of the ground on which this extra cost rests?—Yes.

467. This cost, according to Lord Palmerston's classification, includes two branches; the first is the expense arising from the entertainment of subjects of the British Crown visiting Paris, and the second is the expense which it is necessary to incur in extending hospitality to persons of importance in the country in which he resides?—I do not think that you can separate the two, because they are so completely united. The ambassador at Paris does not give one entertainment exclusively for French and foreign society, and another exclusively for the English; they are blended together, and you cannot separate the two things.

468. I am quite aware of that; but the point that I am directing your attention to is this, that there are two occasions of expenditure, the one having reference to the entertainment of persons from this country, the other having reference to the entertainment of persons abroad, both classes of persons no doubt being entertained at the same time, and under similar circumstances?—Just in the same manner as in this country; you have people of noble families and commoners going to every party in London; there is no difference that I can see.

469. But I think I understood from you in reply to my question, that over and above the ordinary expenditure of an English nobleman or gentleman who might be residing in Paris, there is necessarily, in the case of an ambassador there, an additional cost of representation, as it is called?—Simply because an ambassador would open his doors more widely as a general rule than an ordinary person living in that country. I believe, speaking of this country, that a nobleman with only 5,000 l. a year would be hard put to it to open his doors very widely.

470. You will understand that I am troubling you with these questions because I want to get at the grounds on which, for the public interest, it is necessary to give ambassadors and ministers abroad high salaries?—I think I can explain my meaning by asking you another question; what would be the appearance if an English ambassador were only to receive foreigners at his house and shut his doors to his own countrymen? I think it would have a very extraordinary appearance, and I think the first result would be that there would be a complaint in the House of Commons of that discrimination being made between foreigners and British subjects. If it did not come publicly before the House of Commons I am sure that we should hear of it a great deal in the Foreign Office. We frequently do hear complaints now that people are not invited to parties given by our ministers; and if that rule were laid down at all on the principle that you are seeking to establish, I am afraid that those complaints would be so very loud that my colleague would be put to it to justify the proceeding of the ambassador before the public.

471. I am not seeking to introduce any principle, but merely wish to get at your opinions, which are very valuable no doubt, from your experience. I understand from you that a very considerable amount of the additional expenditure incurred by an ambassador in Paris is incurred in consequence of giving entertainments to people from this country, and also in entertaining persons connected with the court and capital in which he resides?—I really cannot draw any such distinction as you wish me to draw; it is utterly impossible to do so.

472. I do not wish to draw any distinction. I merely want to get at the fact?—But you are asking me, in effect, to make a distinction which it is utterly impossible for any person to make.

473. I think (without pressing you further on that point) you are perfectly aware that the class of persons who go to foreign capitals, and who are entertained by the ambassador, are persons chiefly connected with the higher classes of society?—I am wholly unable to say who are admitted within the doors of an ambassador.

474. You are quite aware that people of humble rank would not be likely to be entertained by them?—That is not a matter that I am competent to speak about. I do not know on what principle any one of our ministers receives people at his house.

475. You are aware that we are now inquiring as to the ground on which this country is justified in paying out of the public purse a certain sum of money?—The ground is, that the position of the country should be maintained, in foreign estimation and its own, by its ambassador not being obliged to live in a manner unbecoming his office. The English ambassador or minister in a large capital must receive, or at least ought to receive, liberally persons of whom society, in the common acceptation of the term, consists. The distinction which you draw, I think, is rather an invidious distinction, because I do not think that it would be imputed as a fault to the Duke of Devonshire, or to Mr. So-and-so in this country, that they did not ask their greengrocer or their butcher to come to their parties.

Rt. Hon. E. Hammond.

476. But supposing that the greengrocer and the butcher paid their share of the cost of the entertainment, could they be fairly omitted?—They have the benefit of the protection resulting from the maintenance of the ambassadors on a proper footing, which protection is valuable to them in all their transactions, direct or indirect, with foreign countries.

477. I am asking this question with a view to learning how the interests of the country are benefited by the great expenditure of ambassadors abroad?—The greater the influence that a minister has abroad, the greater is the extent to which he is able to protect and watch over the interests of his countrymen.

478. By the influence which he brings to bear upon the persons who have authority at the court, do you mean?—By his general influence. If an ambassador is disparaged in a country for one reason or another, he is not listened to by the Government of that country.

479. In reference to giving good dinners to persons residing in foreign courts, you are aware that Sir Hamilton Seymour stated in his evidence before the Committee of 1850, that he considered that the giving of good dinners was a very important part of the duties of an ambassador?—I am aware that he did so; Sir Hamilton Seymour is in London, or was so a few days ago, and perhaps you had better apply to him in reference to that matter.

480. If you will not accept Sir Hamilton Seymour's opinion that there is an advantage in the giving of good dinners by an ambassador, I will not ask you more?—I do not say that this or that person should be invited, but I will endorse it to the fullest extent, if it is meant that it is essential for an ambassader to have his house resorted to by influential people in the country in which he resides.

481. Is it your opinion that the justification for giving these entertainments to persons of influence at foreign courts, is the advantage that this country derives in consequence of its representatives abroad obtaining valuable information on public affairs?—It is part and parcel of the advantage; but the whole hangs together. You may not say that a man gets a specific advantage from this or that thing, but it is part of a whole which gives him influence.

482. Sir Hamilton Seymour was asked in the Committee of 1850, in reference to giving these entertainments, "It is a means of keeping upon a good understanding with the diplomatists and ministers of other countries?" and I beg to call your attention to his reply, "No doubt about it; the man who would be shocked at the idea of a bribe, is open to the agreeable influence of a pleasant dinner and good society." May I venture to ask you whether that is the direction in which you think the giving of these good dinners is calculated to promote the foreign diplomacy of this country?—It is very much the same thing that occurs in ordinary life; you are on better terms with a man that you receive at your table, than with a man that you do not receive at your table. Really I think Sir Hamilton Seymour had better be examined upon his own evidence, and that I should not be examined upon it. I think it is hard that I should be called upon to comment upon his evidence.

483. I am rather anxious to have an opinion drawn from your great experience; I will therefore call your attention to the question which follows: "When you speak of the influence which you obtain by the dinners which you give, what do you suppose you gain in that way more than the Americans obtain by a straightforward legitimate diplomacy?" Sir Hamilton Seymour's answer was, "I ask a man to dinner who is not able to pay me by a dinner, and who therefore is very glad to pay me in another way; he may bring me a piece of intelligence, for example." You will see that the point is quite germane to the examination that we are going into; with your great experience in the Foreign Office, I am anxious to know whether, according to your idea, that is one of the important advantages obtained by our foreign diplomatists giving good dinners?—I cannot answer questions of that kind; I am perfectly willing to say, as I have said already, that I think it is a most essential advantage to the country that the doors of an ambassador or minister should be open, and that people of all classes, diplomatists and people of the country, should come and mix freely at his house. I cannot enter into details; it would be indecorous and improper for me in my situation to go into details on that matter; and I must ask you therefore to take on trust what I say; I might give you instances which might probably surprise the Committee, and for doing which the Committee might turn me out of the room, probably, if I gave them.

484. I will not ask for anything of that kind; but I judge from your reply that we may take it that there is some force in the argument in favour of this costly representation on the part of our ministers, based on the fact that they do get information from quarters from which otherwise they might not get it?—There are many things besides information necessary for a friendly relation between states; the good feeling subsisting between this country and foreign states is kept up in no small measure by the good feeling subsisting between the representatives of the British nation there, and the influential people in the country.

485. Just incidentally I would ask you a question in relation to the cost of the missions in former days; I think in former days the ministers kept a sort of table for the members of the legation?—I believe that you are going back to a very distant period before diplomacy was reckoned a profession, when an ambassador or minister who was sent abroad took with him his own friends, young gentlemen for whom it would be advantageous to see the world, and go the grand tour; but since diplomacy has been considered a profession, the Foreign Office has never held it incumbent on the minister to keep a table for the people attached to him.

486. But since the remote period that you have spoken of, going back to one or two generations ago, I suppose the fact is that secretaries of the different classes have dined at the minister's table as a regular rule?—It has always been at the option of the minister, as far as I know; some ministers have, perhaps, liked to have their attachés and secretaries dining with them continually, and to keep an open table for for them, while others did not care to do so. It has been perfectly free for them to do as they liked.

487. But the practice formerly in the great missions was, that a very considerable expenditure was incurred by the heads of missions in entertaining their subordinates, which is not now incurred?—I cannot say that practically it has so happened in my own knowledge; the rule is, if there is a rule, that there is no obligation upon an ambassador or minister to receive at his table one of his attachés from year's end to year's end. But I think, if I am not mistaken, that in some Paper before the Committee it is said that one of the reasons why ministers and ambassadors who, from kindly feelings towards attachés, might be very glad to see them constantly at their table, have been obliged to restrict their hospitality to them, was the large increase of cost of living which rendered it impossible for them to extend that hospitality to their attachés which they might have wished. I think it is stated in some of the Papers which I laid before you the other day, that the great cost of living has rendered it necessary for ministers to restrict their hospitality; and in confirmation of what I have said, I may add that I have heard that even where, either from having private resources or from his own natural disposition, a minister liked to have his secretaries and attachés constantly at his own table, he invited them only in the morning, and they did not come as of a right. In my memory, no secretary or member of a diplomatic body has, as a right, had admission to the table of the minister.

488. I do not put it in that way; all I want to know is, whether the practice is so?—I do not know sufficient of the missions to be able to say the practice; the exception I would make is, that in the case of a special mission (not the ordinary residential missions), where two or three persons go out attached to the mission, and where the expenditure is all provided for them, of course the staff would dine with the head of the mission.

489. You are aware that this costly system of representation at foreign courts is not adopted by the American ministers?—Simply, I believe, because they have not the means of doing so; and in addition to what I said the other day, I may state that on speaking of my answer I was reminded of one American minister in this country to whom it was so painful to be unprovided with the means of receiving people at his table, that he absolutely refused to go into society at all. Now that is not a proper position for any foreign minister to be placed in, and I think you will admit that.

490. That is putting it in a very extreme way, no doubt, but I should like to speak of the general circumstances of American missions; and I must again ask you whether American diplomatists suffer in consequence of this absence of costly representation?—It is a question which I cannot answer, and which it would be obviously improper for me to answer if I could.

491. You are aware that the Committee on Official Salaries in 1850 recommended that no minister should receive more than 5,000 l. a year?—I am.

492. Did not the Treasury some years since propose to reduce the salary of the ambassador at Paris to 8,000 l. a year, and were they not overruled by the Foreign Office?—The salary of the ambassador at Paris was, I think, in 1851 reduced to 8,000 l. a year.

493. It never was actually reduced; it was only proposed to be reduced, was it not?—I hope it was reduced, because otherwise the Return given by us was an incorrect Return. It is stated in our Return of 1851 as 8,000 l. a year.

494. The scale in 1851 is put down as 8,000 l. a year; "previously to April 1851 the salary of the ambassador at Paris was 10,000 l. a year;" it does not say when it was increased to 10,000 l. a year again; my own impression is that it is a question whether it was ever paid at the rate of 8,000 l.?—When it was increased from 8,000 l. to 10,000 l., it must have been the utter impossibility of the ambassador doing with less.

495. When was it increased?—In 1856.

496. It was brought down to 8,000 l. in consequence of the action of this Committee of 1850, and then was raised to 10,000 l. a year by the Foreign Office?—I cannot say what were the successive processes. It was raised to 10,000 l. a year in 1856.

497. You alluded to the salaries paid to the leading officers of State at home; the most important being the First Lord of the Treasury and the principal Secretaries of State; they receive 5,000 l. a year?—Yes.

498. On what ground would you contend that a larger salary should be paid to ministers abroad?—Simply because ministers abroad live in a different style, and are obliged to live in a different style, from that which ministers in England are obliged to live in.

499. The cost of representation is what you allude to?—The cost of representation, and (what is practically the case, I believe) the increased expense of living abroad as compared with living in England. England, I believe, at this present time, is cheaper than any country abroad, because we have such commercial facilities. Our commercial system has opened our ports to all the necessaries and luxuries of life, and all naturally come to this as the best market.

500. You are quite aware that in case of the great officers of state at home, the additional expenditure is very considerable which is involved in holding those important offices?—I am unable to speak to that. But I think that a large proportion of the gentlemen in England who arrive at high office have considerable private means of their own. If that principle is to be applied to foreign diplomacy you would shut the door to talent in regard to our representation abroad. Many of our ministers abroad have little or no private fortune. I know it for a fact (of course I will not mention names) that the necessary expenditure of many of our ministers is so large that they are obliged, not only to appropriate to it their private income, but also their capital, which they certainly ought to be allowed to set apart for the benefit of their families. Now, in saying that, I am speaking of things almost within my own knowledge, indeed quite within my own knowledge.

501. In the Report of the Committee of 1850 on Official Salaries, evidence was given by very eminent ministers and ex-ministers to the effect that the salaries paid to the principal officers of State in this country were not at all sufficient to cover the additional expenditure which was entailed upon them by their position in those offices?—Will you permit me to say that I am not at all qualified to compare the expenditure in this country, and the rewards given to officers of State in this country, with those abroad. I can only speak of the expenditure which a minister abroad is obliged to incur; and though I did draw that comparison the other day between the American Secretary of State and American ministers abroad, I do not say that it is a fair comparison. But if you will adopt that as a comparison, I believe that most of our ministers and ambassadors will be glad of it.

502. If the diplomatic service were opened and so constituted as to secure in foreign missions the services of a secretary of legation similar in position to the permanent under secretaries at home, is there any reason why public men might not have the ambition to serve as ambassadors or ministers abroad in the same way that they would accept one of the great offices of State at home?—My first answer is, that the question turns upon an "if." The next point is, that I cannot say to what ambition might lead a man. It is a question to which it is impossible for me to give a sensible answer, an answer to such questions must depend upon speculative opinion. I am happy to answer questions as to facts, as far as my knowledge goes, but I really cannot undertake to speculate upon what this or that man might do under these or those circumstances. It is impossible for me to do so; and the fact is that you would put me in an invidious light towards everybody in the public service, and the public generally, if I were to speculate on those things.

503. I should be very sorry to do that, but my object is to get from your experience and judgment an opinion as to the facts that might be brought before this Committee to furnish matter for recommendations in connection with the diplomatic service; and it seems to me that it is not out of reason for me to ask you whether supposing you had an officer of this character, a man similar in position to an under secretary at home, a permanent high officer employed in foreign missions, that would not enable the Government of this country to send over to a foreign mission some public man who might not otherwise have been trained to the diplomatic service?—I would say generally that it would be very undesirable to have attached to a foreign mission a permanent officer of high station, such as those attached to the Foreign Office at home. I think that permanence in a foreign mission is bad. A permanent officer at home may be swayed by influences, but they are the influences of his own country. A permanent officer abroad is only too likely to imbibe the feelings of the court, and to see through the eyes of the court or the Government to which he is accredited, rather than through his own eyes. That I believe, and in fact of that I do know instances.

504. You are quite aware that in former times it was customary for the heads of the great missions in Europe to be changed with the change of Governments?—It was put a stop to, I believe, in 1853, and the reason was that the general foreign policy of the country goes so much in the same groove, whatever party is in power, that there is not now that broad distinction which there formerly used to be between the foreign policy of one party and the foreign policy of another. At the same time, if the foreign policy of the country rendered it disagreeable to a minister to execute the instructions given him by the Secretary of State for the time being, it would be his duty to retire, and his own feeling would make him retire.

505. I have been asking you in reference to the greater missions; but supposing that such a permanent official as I have been suggesting was appointed in connection with missions generally, I wish to ask you whether it would not be practicable to reduce the less important missions, sending ministers there only on special occasions, as the necessity might arise, the first secretary of legation acting as chargé d'affaires?—A chargé d'affaires permanently residing as such at a foreign court would not be looked upon in the same light, or be of the same benefit to his country at home, as a minister would. In the case of a chargé d'affaires acting in the absence of his chief, of course the position of his chief ensures him that respect and consideration which his chief, if he were there, might enjoy, but a mere chargé d'affaires would not receive. And then, being upon that point, I may mention that it is a very sore subject with the South American Republics that we are represented there by chargés d'affaires, and not by ministers. The United States know their feelings so well, that I believe to all the South American Republics they send duly accredited ministers; and the French are now doing the same to a certain extent. It was only the other day that the appointment of a French minister to Chili was mentioned by the Chilian minister in his Report to Congress, as a proof of the estimation in which that country was held by the Government of France. And you may perhaps have seen a statement in a newspaper (I do not myself remember where it was) that one of these South American Republics desired their minister, though also accredited here, to reside in Paris, because they did not choose that he should reside in London, we only maintaining a chargé d'affaires at the seat of his Government.

506. I will ask you some questions, presently, about the South American missions. We will keep now to the European missions?—The ruling feeling is the same. If the feeling in the South American Republics is as I describe it, necessarily, to a much greater degree, would it be the feeling in Europe.

507. Still, having regard to the interests of this country, are you not of opinion that, with the smaller missions, there would be a sufficient representation by our having a permanent secretary of legation acting as chargé d'affaires, with the understanding that whenever necessity arose a minister should be sent?—I hardly know, at this present day, what you would call the smaller missions.

508. Take, for instance, Denmark and Sweden; they can never hope again to take any leading part in the world's affairs, such as they formerly took?—I am not prepared to admit that.

509. You are not prepared to admit that they are, at present, in such a position in Europe?—That was not the question you put; you said, "can never hope."

510. Are they not now in a position to have little or no influence on the politics of Europe?—No, I will not admit that; they have a very material influence.

511. We will take next the small kingdoms and duchies in Germany, which have certainly forfeited, at present, and are never likely to regain, the right of contracting either military conventions or commercial treaties. Why should we, in courts like those, keep up a costly representation?—Which courts are you alluding to?

512. To the courts now connected with Prussia?—I gave an explanation, I think, in regard lard to the only three at which we maintain a lomotic agent, in very great detail, in answer a question from Mr. Kinnaird, on the second , and it is recorded at length in the evi- nce.

513. Is it not the fact, that in regard to witzerland, which is another of the smaller ssions to which I have been alluding, the overnment of that country only send a consul neral to us, while we send an envoy extra- linary to that court?—It is the fact; and one y of accounting for it may be, that we have, d there are, great European interests con- cted with the existing position of Switzerland. l the great powers are represented at Berne, d it would be not only very unseemly, but o very prejudicial to our general position in urope, if we showed to Switzerland that in- fference for her independent position which e now happily occupies, which would be anifested by the suppression of the mission at erne.

514. Wurtemburg, again, has only a consul in ondon, whereas we send there a minister, with ree secretaries of legation; how can that be stified?—The secretary of legation resides at e independent Court of an independent Sove- ign, whose position in Germany is, perhaps, at is present moment, one of the most important most in Europe; it is a small duchy, but, from s position, of very great consequence; I allude the duchy of Baden. Look at the map of urope, and see where Baden lies: it extends long the whole line of the Rhine frontier between rance and Germany, and nobody, on the lightest reflection, can say that that is not at he present time a very important position.

515. It is important to us, as I said before, on he principle of our intervening in foreign affairs?—No, I beg your pardon; it is not im- portant so much in regard to our intervening, but it is important for us to know what may be going on, and what the feeling at that court is; for any convulsion in those countries must react upon the policy and the material interests of this country. I do not think you quite apprehend the importance to England of the maintenance of a good understanding among the powers of the Continent; it is essential to all our manufac- turing and industrial interests, and every effort that we can make to maintain a good under- standing between the Powers of Europe tends to support the interests of our industrial classes here.

516. In regard to the state of the continent, in your opinion can there be said to be more than seven or eight states in Europe between which and this country real international business can be carried on?—My answer is, that in every state where we have either an ambassador or an envoy, international business is carried on of very great importance, in different degrees certainly; but all the states of Europe now hang pretty nearly together, and what concerns one concerns all. That is the general rule.

517. Have you considered the aggregate cost of our present system of representation at the small European courts; we have a Return, which is the one presented by the Foreign Office, from which I will read, if you please, the cost to which I allude:—Bavaria, 5,014*l.*; Belgium, 5,365*l.*; Denmark, 5,514*l.*; Greece, 6,344*l.*; Hesse Darmstadt, 826*l.*; the Netherlands, 5,360*l.*; Portugal, 6,817*l.*; Saxe Coburg, 883*l.*; Saxony, 1,035*l.*; Sweden and Norway, 4,805*l.*; Switzerland, 3,846*l.*; Wurtemburg, 3,520*l.*; making a total of 49,329*l.*; I have taken that from the Return of Expenditure, which includes the aggregate of each mission; is that correct?—The Return is meant to be correct, and I believe it is correct.

518. I simply want to ask you whether you are able to inform the Committee whether it is not a fact that the work of these small legations is of the most trivial and routine character, and that the ministers and secretaries have notoriously very great difficulty in filling up the time which hangs rather heavily on their hands?—I am perfectly unable to answer that question; it is obvious that I cannot answer such a question.

519. With regard to the more important missions in Europe, leaving now the smaller missions, is it not the fact that the conditions under which diplomatic action is carried on are very different from the circumstances of former times?—What times do you speak of, may I ask?

520. A hundred years ago?—I am rather old, but I cannot say what happened a hundred years ago.

521. Fifty years ago?—I cannot recollect that time. But I will not say that the circumstances are essentially different, except perhaps that from the consolidation of the large kingdoms, and the very large military establishments kept up in them, the policy of the nations of Europe requires more attention than it ever did before.

522. I am afraid you have hardly understood the drift of my question; when there were only very limited and difficult means of communication between London and foreign courts, did not much more depend upon the individual judgment and action of ministers abroad than does now?—Everything now depends upon the judgment and tact of the minister in executing whatever instructions are conveyed to him.

523. Conveyed from the Foreign Office?—Yes.

524. But in former years, before these facilities of communication existed, the instructions of the Foreign Office must have been at much longer intervals, and conveyed with much greater difficulty than they are at present?—The policy of the Queen's Government now, as in all times, has been laid down distinctly, though in general terms, for the guidance of British ministers. Special instructions are issued from time to time; but the general policy of the Government is always shadowed out either in the verbal or in the direct instructions by letter, which a minister receives on going to his post.

525. But is it not the fact that in the conduct of any important negotiation, a minister abroad is in the constant habit of receiving instructions from the Government at home?—Of course he is.

526. Then those instructions can be conveyed to him, under the present circumstances, with much greater rapidity and ease than they could have been at some former period, before the discoveries that have been made in modern times?—All business in the world moves much faster now than it did; people acted with much greater deliberation in former times in all the transactions of life; all business is done now at high pressure here, and so it is abroad. We have now the electric telegraph, which for all purposes of business is a very unsatisfactory means of communication; you may send a word, or a sentence, but an explanatory despatch, or an argument to be enforced, you cannot send by a telegraph.

Rt. Hon. E. Hammond.

527. But it is the fact that you use the telegraph in cases of emergency?—In cases of emergency; but then we always expand in subsequent instructions any important brief instructions sent by electric telegraph.

528. No doubt; but if a minister abroad had some negotiation on foot, and there was a point upon which he was required to come to an immediate decision, he might telegraph to the Foreign Office at home, and get upon that point a special instruction?—That of course he might do.

529. That he would do under ordinary circumstances at the present time?—I presume he would.

530. But in former days he could not have done anything of the kind?—It is a very great comfort and support, no doubt, to a Minister at the present day, that he can get, so to say, daily support from the Government at home, whereas, in former times he was obliged to use his judgment, and act upon the general instructions which he might have received, and could not rely, as he does now, upon instructions as to any particular point that may suddenly turn up being sent to him; but the getting instructions upon a particular point does not supersede the daily and hourly transactions in any important negotiation or discussion going on abroad; you want as much, if not more, tact now than ever, for carrying on the diplomatic business.

531. But still after the questions that I have put to you, and without taxing your memory to go back 100 years, I think that you will agree that diplomatic action is carried on now under conditions different from those that existed in former times?—Unquestionably; but the essential difference to which you are trying to lead me does not exist; you wish to lead me (if I may put words into your mouth), into assuming that the position of a diplomatist abroad does not require the same tact and ability now that it did in former times; and that I think is mainly the drift of your questions.

532. I do not admit any drift in my questions; I am now getting at the facts as to the circumstances under which diplomatic action is carried on, and I gather from your reply that in consequence of the advantage that ministers abroad have now of appealing to the Foreign Office more frequently than they could do before, they are not called upon in emergencies to exercise their judgment and decision in the way that they were in former years?—It is a question entirely of degree; and unless you give me the particular circumstances of any negotiation which is going on, it is utterly impossible to answer a question of that kind, because all depends upon the circumstances of the moment. The only answer I wish to give is that you require the same tact and judgment and decision on the part of a representative of the Queen abroad now as you did in former times.

533. But you do not dispute that in an important emergency before giving a decision our representative abroad can now take the opinion of the Foreign Office, which he could not do in former years?—I do not dispute that; but I must add to that that there are two ways of acting upon an opinion. You may act upon an instruction or opinion clumsily, or you may act upon it cleverly; and that is the foundation of my observation, that you require as much tact and discretion now as ever.

534. Has there not been a tendency during the last ten years greatly to restrict the operations of our diplomacy?—Certainly not.

535. Formerly I believe it was thought necessary for this country to mix itself up with all the details of continental politics?—I am not aware that we do not become acquainted with all the details of foreign politics now, for details are necessary to enable you to judge of a matter in the mass; at least you cannot judge safely of a mass without knowing all the details.

536. May I take your answer to mean this, that there has been no practical difference in the mode of dealing with continental matters pursued by the Foreign Office during the last few years?—Practically not.

537. Was the course which was taken in former years in connection with continental politics in obtaining information on matters of detail the same as the course taken now?—I can never trace any difference.

538. I think that I have gathered from the evidence which you have given before previous Committees, and also from the evidence which you have given on the present occasion, that a very primary object in the conduct of our missions abroad is to obtain information upon current events of a political character in foreign states?—The obtaining of that information is necessary to regulate the conduct of our missions abroad under the instructions of the Secretary of State. It is necessary that the Secretary of State should be informed of all events abroad in order that he may give the right instructions.

539. And the object of our missions abroad is to obtain that information for the guidance of the Secretary of State in the management of the foreign policy of the country?—Certainly.

540. Do you not think that in this respect, owing to the amazing ability with which the press of this country, more especially the "Times," obtains accurate and early information, the operation of our foreign missions has been much reduced in importance?—I really must decline any reference to the operations of the press. I do not think that it would be right for me to express an opinion as to the merits or demerits of the publications in the daily journals.

541. But is not the intelligence obtained by the press often in advance of that procured by the Foreign Office?—I will say that intelligence (leaving out the "the") may be so obtained, but you will understand that I do not say that that intelligence is in all cases necessarily correct.

542. Formerly the action of foreign Governments might be dictated by a secret intrigue which it might be difficult for an envoy to discover; but now, in constitutional Governments are not questions of policy very publicly discussed and determined in the main by the decisions of public opinion affecting the legislature?—The difficulty that I have in answering the question is the want of a definition of a really constitutional Government.

543. You think it is necessary, in order to answer my question, that that should be defined?—Yes; the possession of a Chamber does not constitute a constitutional Government for all practical purposes, in the same manner as it constitutes it in this country. The influence of the Sovereign, even in the so-called constitutional Governments of the Continent, is quite a different influence from what the Sovereign exercises in this country.

544. But

544. But I presume that the Foreign Office is very much guided by information as to the state of public opinion in foreign countries, and as to the probable action of foreign Governments?—The state of public opinion in foreign countries is, of course, an ingredient for consideration, but it is not the only one.

545. Is it not a very important thing for the Foreign Office to know what is the general feeling amongst the members of the legislative bodies of foreign countries, as dictating the policy of those countries?—Of course it is important to know it, but it does not necessarily follow that the opinion of individual members sways the policy of the country.

546. But are you not able, in the Foreign Office, to form an opinion as to the probable course of action in foreign countries, rather from the ordinary channels of information, and the reports of the action of legislative assemblies, than from mere information picked up by secretaries of legation?—It would be very unsafe for the interests of the country if we were to rely entirely upon information deduced from those sources.

547. Is not the information obtained by the Foreign Office, upon which you are disposed to rely, from missions abroad liable to be influenced unfavourably by ministers mixing in particular cliques, or by their sympathies being engaged with one of the political parties of the country?—That is a question that I beg to be excused from answering, because incapacity, and inability, and neglect of duty on the part of our ministers are implied by it.

548. I will now leave that part of the subject and go to another; do you not consider that as the greatness of this country mainly depends upon our commercial prosperity, the interests of commerce should occupy a leading position in the duties of foreign missions?—They do so.

549. I will now, if you please, refer to the answers that you were kind enough to give on the last occasion in reference to the secretaries of legation; at Question 369, I asked you whether the reports of the secretaries of legation came through the heads of missions; your reply was, "I believe they always do; they do not come into my hands, from the changes in the distribution of the office, but I believe they always do come, and they ought to come, through the heads of missions, who merely forward them"?—Yes.

550. I find in a despatch from Lord Clarendon, dated 1857, some instructions relating to this matter: "While assigning this specific duty to Her Majesty's secretaries of embassy and legation, it is not intended in any way to release them from the superintendence and control of the heads of missions. They will remain, as now, wholly subordinate to their chiefs, and they will report exclusively to them. On the other hand, Her Majesty's Government expect that the heads of missions will give effect to the object which they have in view, by obtaining for their secretaries access to all sources of information, by encouraging them by their support and advice, and by pointing out to them the matters to which their attention may most usefully be directed;" that goes very much beyond the answer that you gave to me, that these reports were merely forwarded by the heads of missions?—I beg your pardon. In the passage which you have read, the instructions had reference to preparing reports, whereas my answer only applied to forwarding the reports when prepared.

551. The whole scope of my inquiries, the other morning, was with a view to get from you information to show that these reports were under the direction of the ministers in chief and heads of missions, and that therefore it was right and reasonable that all members of the mission should aid in preparing those reports, and obtaining information for the purpose of the reports?—That may have been the object of the question; but those reports are the reports of the individual secretaries of legation. The head of a mission would very naturally say to a subordinate, "I think a report upon the industrial classes, the poor laws, or any other specific matter, might be of interest; do not you think so? If you do, I will put you in relation with such and such a person, who can give you information on the subject." That is the meaning of that passage; and when I refer to the minister forwarding those reports, it is simply because the secretary of legation has no direct correspondence with the Foreign Office, and they must come through the hands of his chief. That is perfectly consistent with what you read.

552. But it seems to me that the words which I have read imply a much more active share on the part of the head of the mission than the answer which you gave to the Committee the other day?—I cannot see that.

553. I will read you the next passage in Lord Clarendon's despatch; "Her Majesty's Government will expect to receive from the heads of missions copies of the reports made to them by their secretaries, accompanied with any additional observations which they may themselves see occasion to offer?"—Under that instruction they would not make any observations unless they saw occasion to make them.

554. May I ask you whether it is at all usual for the reports of the secretaries of legation to be accompanied by any observations from the heads of missions?—If any observation does accompany them, it is probably an acknowledgment of the zeal and industry shown by the secretary of legation in preparing the report; that is generally the case, I believe.

555. I see there is another despatch from the Foreign Office bearing on this point; it is from Lord Russell in 1860. Lord Russell, in this circular, states, "I have reason to suppose that some misapprehension prevails in regard to the obligation on the part of secretaries to furnish reports in that capacity when acting as chargé d'affaires, or when absent on leave, or only recently appointed to a post; I have therefore to desire that it may be understood that secretaries of legation are not exempted from the duty of reporting in consequence of being for the six months preceding the date of their report, or for any portion thereof, acting as chargé d'affaires. Secondly, That absence on leave does not exempt a secretary from making his reports at stated times; he must obtain materials for those reports from the place at which he holds the appointment." Now, is that instruction of Lord Russell's acted upon by the secretaries of legation in the preparation of these reports?—I presume it is, I cannot say positively.

556. Because part of the instruction is that if a secretary is on leave (and I wish to call your attention to this point), he is not exempted from the duty of furnishing a report, but he is required to obtain information for the purpose of the report from the place at which he holds his appointment, and to send in his report as though he were present at his mission?—There is no difficulty in his obtaining information from the place to which he is attached. If a person is writing a book, he does not necessarily go to seek every fact at any place with which it might be connected; he obtains information from other sources, without going to the place itself, or at least he can do so. The object of that instruction was merely to obviate any excuse for not making a report because of occasional absences; and when that instruction was issued, I think the secretary of legation was habitually not more than three months away from his post; the report was to be made periodically, and he might be a portion of his time at his post, and another portion in this country, and in the latter case he might have papers sent to him; but Mr. Lowther is much more competent than I am to state the practice, having been a secretary of legation himself.

17 March 1870.

557. I am not desirous to depreciate these appointments, but I understand from you that this instruction of the Foreign Office is carried out, and that a secretary of legation, away from his place of appointment, obtains materials in the best way he may, and sends, at the stated time, his report into the Foreign Office?—I presume he does. I am unable, however, of my own knowledge, to say that he does, because, in the first place, I do not always see the reports; they come in periodically; but I imagine that the instructions are followed.

558. In those cases, would you suppose that the secretary, absent from his post, would send his report, under cover to his chief, before it was transmitted to the Foreign Office?—He should do so. It is one of those things that we would not specially press. But it so happens, that only a few weeks ago a minister wrote to me to request that the report of a member of his mission, who was on leave, on a particular subject entrusted to him, should pass through his hands before it came to the Foreign Office. That is the practice, I believe; it ought to be so at all events.

559. I am anxious to be satisfied that, under the instructions of the Foreign Office in relation to this important matter, the heads of missions are expected to take an active personal supervision of those material interests which come within these reports?—If you mean by supervision, correcting and amending the secretary's report, I do not consider that that is the duty of the head of a mission, and it would entirely defeat the object of the regulation if he did so. We want the report to be that of the secretary himself from just those materials which he has obtained, from year to year, from books or personal observation, or from people who have given him the information; but it must be the man's own report, and ought not to be corrected by anybody. Supervision, as I understand it, means seeing that the report is sent in at a certain time, and, if you choose to carry it still further, that the secretary of legation has those facilities afforded to him for collecting materials for his report, which it is the desire of the Foreign Office should be at his disposal.

560. But still, as I understood from you on Monday (and I think it is a most important point), the object of these reports is not simply an educational training for these young men?—The original object was merely training for the young men. For the first years we never published those reports; but some cause or other, which now I cannot remember, led us to suppose that they would be interesting to the mercantile community of the country, and from that time they have been, as a general rule, published. The object, however, of making the reports was the training of the secretary of legation, by causing him to direct his attention to what was going on in the country; and that is especially needed now, when the social and industrial pursuits of the Continent are matters in which the public in this country take a particular interest.

561. And is it not, and ought it not to be, a most leading point in the action of our missions abroad to obtain information for this country on matters of that kind?—Certainly it ought to be; and the missions are acting on that principle.

562. Then I would ask you, taking that principle, and looking at the great importance of the interests involved, is it not desirable that the heads of missions, beyond merely carrying out the instructions which the Foreign Office has laid down in their despatch just now read, and which go rather further than I think I understood you to state, should take a more responsible part in the superintendence of those important reports?—The head of a mission would, of course, report generally upon all industrial and commercial questions which might arise from time to time; but these reports are things special in themselves; they would cease to be secretaries of legations' reports if you made them, as you assume they should be, ministers' reports. It involves the point whether the heads of missions should themselves make periodical reports.

563. The heads of missions, I presume, when in communication with the Foreign Office on political matters, would take care that their communications went direct from themselves to the Foreign Office?—And so they would upon commercial matters. At this present time our correspondence with our missions is divided between political and commercial correspondence. A great portion of the correspondence that goes out of the Foreign Office in London goes out of the commercial division, is addressed by the Secretary of State to the ambassador, and is acted upon by him, in the same manner as the political part is addressed by the Secretary of State to the ambassador, and is acted upon by him. The ambassador is not debarred from dealing with commercial matters; on the contrary, all that occurs in the country as regards commercial matters is from time to time brought by him before the Secretary of State. I cannot tell you myself what the number is, but our register would show that in the last two months, since the beginning of the year, the number of despatches received from Lord Lyons on commercial matters is very large.

564. Leaving out of view the mere educational training of the secretaries of legation, and having regard to the information of the public, do you see any objection to these reports upon the industrial interests of different countries being sanctioned by passing under the authority of the chief of the mission?—They do so now, if the instructions are obeyed; they are passed through his hands.

565. But

565. But I understood you to say that he would not think of correcting any misstatement, for instance, in any of those reports?—If there were a palpable misstatement, he would doubtless tell the secretary, "you are wrong in that particular point."

566. I am afraid that in practice the reports come to the Foreign Office just as they are written by the secretary, with a communication, if necessary, from the head of the mission?—I see no objection to that. I think you scarcely understand the distinction between the two things. The report of the secretary of legation is upon a particular subject; he does not treat of the whole commerce of the country. Very often the reports have been upon matters having nothing on earth to do with commerce; I may say matters of great interest at this very moment. The Committee and the House will, for instance, this year have before them an immense mass of reports upon the land tenure of the countries of Europe. I believe they extend to a thousand pages.

567. I gather from your remarks that there is a very large amount of attention paid to commercial interests in our foreign missions, and I should like to ask you whether you do not think that the relative importance of foreign missions may be fairly measured by the extent of the trade existing with this country?—No, I cannot agree with that necessarily. There may be a small amount of trade with a foreign country, but political questions may arise in that foreign country, which, though they would not interfere with the commercial interests of the country as regards that foreign country, might, if insufficiently known, have a very important and prejudicial bearing upon the commerce of this country generally. That is the purport of the answer which I gave the other day. What I mean to say is this, that nothing can happen in Europe which disturbs the peace of Europe without more or less interfering with the industry of this country; and I have illustrated that by reminding you that the Civil War in America paralysed entirely a very large and important industry of this country; and, in fact, all the commercial interests in the country are still more or less suffering from the effects of that Civil War, and yet we had nothing to do with it.

568. But you put in a Paper the other day which had a bearing upon the relative expenditure of missions in South America, and that Paper referred us to the relative amount of trade between this country and the countries there: proceeding upon that, I ask you whether you think that the considerations affecting the relative proportions of trade between this country and other countries ought not to affect the importance of the missions accredited to those countries?—I think that in the case of those countries it is very essential that there should be an efficient diplomatic representative of some class or other; and I am perfectly prepared to go further, and say, that if the Committee would recommend that those missions in South America should be placed on a higher footing, and that the country should bear the expense of doing so, our position in those countries would be very much improved.

569. We will keep to the larger missions just at the present time. I dare say you are aware that our commercial transactions with the United States are about six times as great as those with Turkey, but I find that the cost of the Turkish Embassy is rather more than twice the cost of our mission to the United States. Probably you will not dispute that when I tell you that it is taken from the Return to Parliament?—Certainly I shall not. One reason may be assigned for that, namely, that the two countries are essentially different; you do not want a dragoman in the United States; our minister can speak with the President of the United States, and the Secretary of the United States, in a common language; in Constantinople our dragomans alone cost us about 3,000*l.* a year.

570. You are aware that the salary of the head of the mission in Turkey is higher than that of the head of the mission in the United States?—Certainly it is; and it is very important that the representative of this country in Turkey should hold ambassadorial rank; he has held it almost from time immemorial; long before our interests in Turkey were committed to the charge of the Foreign Office absolutely, in the time of the Levant Company, an ambassador was always, and I believe wholly, maintained by the Levant Company, though of course appointed by the Crown.

571. The diplomatic relationship between other leading countries in Europe and Turkey must require as much representation as that of Great Britain; take France and Austria for instance?—France has an ambassador in Turkey, and I should think she incurs very much the same rate of expenditure as ours. There is some difference of salary resulting from the habits of life in this country; and I am sure you would not wish an English ambassador going abroad to put off his English habits and feelings and become a foreigner. He carries the habits of this country with him abroad, and there is unquestionably greater expense incurred by an English diplomatist than by a foreign one; I would rather not discuss the point; there are reasons, which a great number of the members of this Committee must be aware of, how that comes to pass.

572. Still the fact is, that the French ambassador in Turkey, according to the Return put in by yourself, receives 5,600*l.* a year, while our ambassador receives 8,000*l.* a year?—Yes.

573. And the Austrian ambassador there receives 6,090*l.* a year, and the Prussian minister receives only 3,000*l.* a year?—That may be so. No English ambassador, and no Englishman, I would say, generally well keeping a house, will keep house on the same sum as a foreigner.

574. Then I suppose I must take your answer to mean, that under the circumstances of the case, we cannot expect our ambassadors and ministers at the principal courts of Europe, to be content with salaries of a similar magnitude to those paid to the ministers and ambassadors of other powers?—They cannot live upon them without trenching upon their private means, and it is an unfair thing for any country to impose upon its public servants the necessity of spending their private fortune for the maintenance of the interests of the country.

575. I have not said anything about the United States, but in this Return, to which I have alluded, all their salaries are very much less than the salaries of our ambassadors and ministers?—I may remind you that I said on the last occasion that the ministers of the United States are inadequately paid, and they know it and feel it; and I told you only the other day that I had had brought brought before me the fact of two American ministers being obliged to resign their employment from inability to live upon their salaries; and one of those ministers, if I am rightly informed, was at a place where a higher salary was paid to him than to our own minister.

17 March 1870.

576. I see from the Return that our minister to the United States has an allowance of 800 l. a year for house rent?—£. 1,000. a year.

577. I see also from the Return which has just been presented by the Foreign Office, that the British Embassy House at Constantinople has cost, since 1843, 158,226 l., and the British Embassy House at Therapia, 41,029 l., making a total of about 200,000 l.?—You will excuse my saying that it is not the Embassy House alone at Constantinople that cost that money, but the British Consulate and Embassy House at Constantinople; and I believe, moreover, that that sum includes also the restoration of the chapel. But whether or no, this Return extends over a period of 26 years, and the reason of the great cost was that at Constantinople fires occur occasionally, and the old Embassy House was burned down in 1831. And at Constantinople it would be impossible to hire a suitable house for love or money, and if you did hire one it would in all probability be a wooden house. I believe that we did hire houses while the Embassy House was rebuilding, and we paid an enormous sum for them, and we were in daily dread of the place being consumed by fire.

578. Then I suppose I am to understand that this great expenditure has been carried on under the authority of the Foreign Office?—Carried on under the authority of the Treasury. It was to provide a building for the Foreign Office.

579. It is upon the recommendation of the Foreign Office that this large expenditure has taken place during the last 27 years?—I will not say that it was upon the recommendation of the Foreign Office, because if the Foreign Office had had its own will, nothing like that expenditure would have been incurred. Long before the time to which that Return goes back, after the house was burned, we obtained an estimate, with the sanction of the Treasury, for rebuilding that house, including also the chapel, and, I think, a consulate. If that estimate had been adopted, the expenditure for rebuilding would have been much less than it has proved to be.

580. Then I understand that that was not adopted by the Treasury?—It was not adopted by the Treasury, partly, I believe, on account of some suggestion made from Constantinople.

581. Then if the Treasury had taken a different course, you think that it would have been a less expenditure?—It would have been a much less expenditure.

582. I believe that I am right in assuming that this Return (which I know has given you a great deal of trouble) does not include all the particulars that I have asked for; I mean the expenses of the repairs which have been devoted to the Embassy House at Constantinople?—No. I told you the other day, that for making out part of that Return it has been necessary to examine at the Audit Office 1,200 accounts, and between 8,000 and 10,000 vouchers, and it has occupied the time of three men for a month to do so, and at the Office of Works many hundreds of documents have also had to be examined.

583. That is to say, over and above the 200,000 l. spent in these buildings at Constantinople, we shall, unfortunately, find that a considerable sum of money has been spent in repairs?—That I cannot tell you. I do not know whether the hospital is included in those buildings or not. The chapel was burnt, I know, in the fire of 1831, and in all the expenditure for Constantinople the cost of repairing that chapel has been included, and our consular buildings also are included.

584. I take it that this has been spent very much upon the recommendation of the Foreign Office, and that you, as representing the Foreign Office, do not disapprove of this enormous expenditure?—I beg your pardon; I said just the contrary; it is not for me to approve or disapprove of it; but I say that if the first recommendation of the Foreign Office had been followed in 1835, or 1836, that large expenditure would not have been incurred. The Foreign Office have nothing on earth to do with the amount of expenditure on account of building in Constantinople; it was entirely conducted by the Board of Works, sending out their own architect; of course we saw the plan, and knew it; we required a building, but all the details were settled independently of us.

585. I will now go to the South American missions. You have told us that our interests suffer very materially in connection with these missions, by reason of our not being properly represented there?—What I said was, that I considered that in some cases our interests suffered from our not being properly represented. I have nothing to say against the gentlemen, as your question would imply; but I speak of the gentlemen not having a sufficient representative character. I doubt not that if that character were raised the Queen would give her letters of credence to every one of those gentlemen, and they would well deserve it. It is the fault of the country, not the fault of the men.

586. But would that recommendation of yours be answered if these representatives had higher rank without any higher salary?—I do not ask any higher salary for them, and they say that they do not ask any higher salary for themselves; but I certainly never did yet know a man who took an advancement in rank upon the same salary held before, who did not within a year or two come and represent that he wanted a higher salary.

587. But as to our connection with those South American missions, is it not the fact that in relation to the Brazils in former years, a very large portion of the action of the Foreign Office and our representatives abroad had reference to questions connected with the suppression of the slave trade?—A great deal.

588. Those questions have now subsided?—They have subsided, as regards the slave trade, entirely; but there is a great deal going on in Brazil which those persons in this country who take an interest in matters connected with slavery think ought still to be watched over; I allude to the domestic slavery; the descendants of the slave trade system, which is now happily abolished, are still to be found in Brazil.

589. Is it not the fact that, in relation to the other missions in South America, a very large amount of the time and attention of the Foreign Office has been directed towards questions arising out of debts contracted by those countries towards persons in our own country?—Yes, unfortunately it has.

590. People

590. People in England have lent money to ose states, and have then come to the Foreign lice to assist them in getting it back?—We equently are appealed to to assist in regard to ans contracted by people in this country with reign states; but as a general rule we abide a dictum of Lord Palmerston's, that the Gornment is not bound to extricate bondholders this country from the difficulties in which they e involved.

591. I take it to be your opinion, from what ou have just now said, that people in this country ho choose to lend money to countries abroad, a high rate of interest, and with little security, ave no right to come to the Foreign Office to et them to collect their debts?—Of course, if ey had an absolute right to come to the Foreign ffice, right would be done to them by the oreign Office; but if you ask my view of the eory of the question, I should say that to give ound for appealing for that protection, as of ght, they ought to be able to show that the ain which they made, or contemplated making hen they made the loan, was in some way ared by the British Exchequer.

592. Practically, then, the course taken by the oreign Office is not to encourage the action of ur ministers in South America in connection ith these claims?—There is this difference: we ould, of course, authorise our minister to use is good offices on behalf of any parties as far as micable representations and expressions of goodill go; but we should not, except under peculiar ircumstances, authorise our minister to use irect official action upon those states in such ases.

593. With respect to the position which our inisters occupy in South America, and which ou think is not satisfactory, we have at Buenos Ayres a minister plenipotentiary with a salary f 3,000 l. a year, with a number of other secrearies of legation and second secretaries?—Not number; I believe that there are only one ecretary of legation and one third secretary.

594. There is a secretary of legation and a econd secretary, I see. The minister plenipoentiary has 3,000 l. a year, with a rent of 300 l.; he secretary of legation has 500 l., and the second ecretary 250 l.; and then there are certain other harges, making the total diplomatic expenditure t Buenos Ayres, 4,617 l.?—Yes; but the mission o the Argentine Republic now extends also to Uruguay.

595. You are aware that the Argentine Republic has ministers plenipotentiary whom it ends to represent its interest at foreign courts; I think we have one in London?—He is accredited to both the English and French Governments.

596. I have got in a Return presented to the House, entitled "Reports of Her Majesty's Representatives Abroad," rather a singular statement in connection with the Argentine Republic, of the salaries paid to their ministers plenipotentiary, and I find that they pay 145 l. a year to their ministers plenipotentiary; to chargé d'affaires, 72 l. 5 s.; to secretaries of legation, 61 l. 9 s.; and to attachés, 41 l.; I do not suppose that any of us would recommend that style of salary for our own missions, but I wish to draw your attention to that, in order to show that while we pay our representatives at Buenos Ayres, something like 3,000 l. a year, besides house rent and other considerations, the Argentine Republic consider it quite sufficient to pay their representatives upon a very much smaller scale, for they only pay 145 l. per year to their ministers plenipotentiary? — I presume they pay according to their means and their interests. British interests in the Argentine Republic are much greater than those of the Argentine Republic in this country. We have got a large commerce there which requires the protection of a minister, and we have a large number of British subjects who require the protection of a minister. No subjects of another country require protection in this country in the way that protection is required in foreign countries for British subjects and British interests. Without that diplomatic protection, at a fair amount of salary, the commercial interest and the personal interests of our subjects would suffer very greatly. And it is only just lately that the North German Confederation, generally rather economical in its expenditure, has found it necessary to appoint diplomatic reprerentatives to those countries. If you will allow me to read an extract from a despatch from our ambassador at Berlin, it will bear me out very much in what I say as regards the necessity of diplomatic protection for our trade in those countries. This is what Lord Augustus Loftus says: "I have inquired of Mr. Delbruch whether it was intended to establish a paid consulate general of the North German Confederation at Lima with a salary of 10,000 dollars a year. He has informed me that the rumour which has reached your Lordship was perfectly founded, and that the Chancellor of the North German Confederation intended shortly to appoint a consul general and chargé d'affaires at Lima with the abovementioned salary. He stated that it had been found necessary to give a diplomatic character to their consular agents in South America. It was true that they had no interests in these republics but those of a commercial character and the protection of their countrymen, but it had been found that agents merely invested with a consular dignity found difficulty in obtaining personal communication with the chiefs and higher authorities in those states, and to obviate this inconvenience it had been found desirable to give to their agents in the South American Republics a diplomatic character. I may here observe to your Lordship, that several of the chambers of commerce in Northern Germany have specially petitioned the Government to appoint official agents, with a diplomatic and not merely a consular character, to the South American Republics." I quote that as showing what, in the estimation of our German neighbours, is the value of diplomatic protection in those states.

597. In your reply to my question, you have made use of the words "diplomatic protection," and "fair amount of salary," as being necessarily very closely connected, but you would hardly say that the diplomatic protection in any place depended upon the amount of salary which you gave to the minister there?—No, but the diplomatic protection extended by a minister is more influential, as a general rule, than that extended by a consul general. As I have said before, the states in South America appreciate very highly a foreign minister being resident there, holding a diplomatic letter of credence from the Queen; and as an illustration of that, I believe that the other day a soreness of feeling was occasioned in Uruguay by the suppression of our independent diplomatic officer who had resided there, though only with the rank of a chargé d'affaires and consul general, and connecting it with our mission in the Argentine Republic.

598. You are aware that the appointments to some of these missions are varied in rank from time to time?—Originally I believe, when the South American Republics were first established in 1825, the estimate was for a full mission. I was turning over the leaves of that same book which I have already referred to, and I found that.

599. Are you aware that taking for instance Central America, there was in 1849 a consul general who was then appointed chargé d'affaires, that on his removal in 1850 the mission was reduced to a consul generalship, when Sir Charles Wyke was appointed; that in 1854 it was again raised to a chargé d'affaireship; that then when Mr. Matthew was appointed it was raised to a minister plenipotentiary; that he was transferred to Columbia, which was raised from a chargé d'affaireship to a mission on his appointment, but again reduced when he did not go; that Mr. Matthew was afterwards removed to Buenos Ayres as minister, and the mission in Central America again reduced to chargé d'affaireship, so that there seems to have been a change half a dozen times in the course of half a dozen years?—I have no doubt that it may have been the case.

600. You have alluded to the reduction of Monté Video; can you give us any reason why other small missions should not be similarly reduced?—Simply that Monté Video and Buenos Ayres being on the same river may easily be amalgamated; but it would be exceedingly difficult to amalgamate Chili and Peru, between which thousands of miles intervene. In the same manner, in Central America, we consider that we need maintain only one diplomatic representative, while the United States have five. Central America consists of five different republics; and we have one diplomatic representative accredited to all the five. He visits them or corresponds occasionally with them; but the United States have five missions.

601. There may be a reason for that in the proximity of the United States?—Unquestionably; and that comes exactly to what I was saying the other day, that when the United States have an interest they do not care what money they spend. They spend in South America for their diplomatic missions 3,000 l. a year more than we do.

602. But they have very many more agents for their money than we have?—But we do not think that our interests require so many agents.

603. But we pay our agents much more than they pay theirs?—No, not throughout South America. We do so in Brazil and Buenos Ayres, and in some others of the South American States. But in Chili they pay nearly one-fifth more than we do, and in Peru they pay one-fifth more than we do, and in Ecuador they pay 140 l. a year more than we do; so that there is not any material difference between us and the United States in those countries, except as I have said, at Buenos Ayres and in Brazil.

604. But we have two very expensive establishments at Buenos Ayres and Brazil?—It must be borne in mind that the United States diplomacy is quite on a different footing from our own. You would hardly suppose, for instance, that the business of the United States in this country could be conducted by only two secretaries. How they do it I do not know. For a long time there has been only one secretary here. He has doubtless got through the business with the zeal and ability for which he is distinguished, but I have no doubt that his labours have been much more severe than could be reasonably imposed upon any man. I should be very sorry either to discharge the amount of business which the secretary of legation of the United States, without the assistance of a clerk, has been called upon to perform, or to impose such onerous duties upon any person belonging to our service.

605. In reference to the point which you raised the other day about having only one secretary of legation at a court, you implied that there ought to be always more than one; I wish on that subject to call your attention to a despatch from Mr. Odo Russell, in reply to Lord Clarendon. He says, "Your Lordship is also pleased to ask me to explain specially my views as to the staff which I consider is absolutely required at my mission; I can only say in answer that I have been my own staff for 11 years, and that I therefore cannot possibly do with less in the future?"—But although Mr. Odo Russell's services are invaluable at Rome he has not the duties to perform there that are performed at a mission. We have no diplomatic intercourse with Rome strictly speaking; Mr. Odo Russell, acting at Rome with the diplomatic rank of secretary of legation, performs his duties as well, as efficiently, and as satisfactorily to the public as if he were the most talented ambassador that ever served the British Crown; and I only wish that he could have at Rome the reward, the station, and the salary which are justly his due.

606. I have no doubt that he fills a very important place, and fills it with great ability; but the fact is that he has no secretary?—We have no mission there.

21 March 1870.

607. Chairman.] I BELIEVE that you have a paper which you wish to put in?—Yes; it is a return showing the establishment of the French embassies and missions at the different courts; it is taken from the French official sources, and I think it may be useful to the Committee.

608. There is a statement on the account put in by you, of foreign ministers extraordinary, of 30,539*l.* for the year 1868-9; but it appears by the Appropriation Account presented lately to Parliament, that foreign ministers extraordinary were entered at 45,408*l.*; how do you account for the discrepancy?—The extraordinaries of the Persian mission now first come in to the general account of extraordinaries of the diplomatic service. But in this account of the expenditure—(pointing to the Appropriation Accounts)—are included the expenses of special missions and services and outfits, amounting to 14,869*l.*; but those expenses are not comprised within the class of the extraordinary expenses, properly so called, of Her Majesty's ministers abroad; and that reduces the amount to 30,539*l.*, set forth in the statement.

609. Mr. Rylands.] Still this estimate of extraordinaries amounts to 40,659*l.*, including the Persian?—That estimate, which includes the expenditure on account of Persian extraordinaries, was put in as showing the basis on which the vote of last year was taken, derived from the expenditure of the year next but one antecedent. It must be remembered that estimate and expenditure are not identical and convertible terms. The estimate is what you conjecture may be spent; you do not know what has been spent till you get an account of the expenditure. A great deal of confusion results from the entire change in the system of accounts and estimates which we are obliged to present under the new Exchequer Audit Act. It will all get regular in a year or two; but these Appropriation Accounts have been presented perhaps a year earlier than for the general clearness of the accounts it was desirable that they should have been presented. We have hardly had time to get them into a regular shape. Quite a new system of accounts has been thrown on all the public offices.

610. Still I may assume that during the last 20 years there has been a considerable increase in the extraordinary expenditure of foreign missions for incidental expenses, as shown in the Estimates?—Yes; and you may also assume that during the last 10 years there has been a considerable decrease, a decrease of about 4,000*l.*

611. Taking the Estimates for 1869–70, and comparing them with the Estimates for 1848-9, are you aware that the extraordinary expenditure on the French Embassy increased from 841*l.* to 3,219*l.*; Russia from 404*l.* to 1,859*l.*; Turkey from 5,270*l.* to 9,263*l.*; Prussia from 657*l.* to 1,356*l.*; Portugal from 476*l.* to 1,221*l.*, and the United States from 650*l.* to 3,520*l.*?—It is impossible for me to follow you through such a calculation as that; but I should like to give you the totals of the difference of expenditure between 1858–9 and 1868–9. After all, without going into details of that kind, you must take the aggregate expenditure. I could explain, probably, every one of those cases, if I had time to go into it; but if you wish details, the chief clerk, who is the accountant of the office, will be able, no doubt, to explain them satisfactorily. I will only deal with the general result, which is, that in 1858-9 the extraordinary expenditure was 36,818*l.*, in the following year 38,552*l.*, and, in the year 1868-9, 30,539*l.*, exclusive of telegrams and extra couriers; therefore I claim credit for a considerable and progressive reduction, as you will see, for many years past, in the amount of extraordinaries.

612. But prior to that reduction there was a considerable increase over the expenditure of 1848-9?—Unquestionably there was, because there was a considerable increase of expense in everything in the world; you would not obtain servants' at wages so low, nor would you get anything as cheap as formerly; and then you should bear in mind also, that since that time we have had thrown on us the heavy charge for telegrams, which we had not in 1848-9. I see in this Paper which I have before me, and which I will put in, as far as it goes, that in one year, 1859–60, 8,000*l.* were charged for telegrams alone; in 1867–8 there were 2,000*l.* charged under that head.

613. But that ought to lessen the expenditure, probably, in other departments?—I beg your pardon; not only does it not lessen, but it tends to increase it, I think.

614. However, the fact is, I understand that although you have diminished the expenditure during the last 10 years, you had materially increased it during the preceding 10 years?—Unquestionably it had increased from what it was in 1848-9.

615. May I ask whether the Foreign Office has taken steps to secure a reduction of extraordinaries?—If you will turn to the Blue Book now before you, you will find that stringent instructions on that subject were sent out to our missions generally, and to Constantinople in particular.

616. I have got the circular despatch to which you alluded before me, being a despatch from Lord Russell in 1860, in which he lays down certain regulations with respect to this extraordinary expenditure by foreign ministers; and I should like to ask you whether the regulations laid down by Lord Russell with a view to check that expenditure have been fully carried out?—As a general result, the expenditure is much less. In 1860 the net total of extraordinaries was 38,552*l.*, and in 1867-8 it was 33,607*l.*, and in 1868–9, 30,539*l.*, exclusive of telegrams and extra couriers, but, necessarily, extraordinary expenditures must vary from year to year. You can not calculate exactly what incidental expenses may arise. Take postages; they seem to maintain a very great regularity. Telegrams are much less now than they were in 1860; we have reduced by three-fourths the expenditure of telegrams. The journeys on the public service have increased; a great number of those journeys on the public service have been incurred for purposes of general utility and obtaining information in different parts of the country, and have also been incurred in consequence of what passed in the Committee of the House of Commons in 1861, as to paying the travelling expenses of the junior members of missions.

617. My object is to ascertain how far the regulations of Lord Russell have been carried out; as an instance, I will refer to the point in respect to extra copying and translations: Lord Russell says, "With regard to the charges for extra copying and translations, interpreters, attachés, and clerks, I should hope that the regulations as to acquaintance with foreign languages being now required of the junior members of the missions will shortly cause the charges for interpreters and translations altogether to disappear from the accounts; and I shall expect that every account of extraordinary expenditure in which those charges figure, shall be accompanied by a special despatch from the head of the mission, stating the names of the attachés in residence, and the reasons why the translations have not been made by them; and in regard to the charges for extra copying, I shall expect an explanation with each account in which they appear, showing the grounds on which those charges have been incurred;" can you say whether that regulation, for instance, has been acted upon?—If there is any charge for extra translations it should be explained. If a mission is overcharged with translations which its staff is inadequate to perform, permission is asked to charge the ex penses in the extraordinaries.

618. There is another point in the instructions "I have further to instruct you in each suc ceeding quarter to send home with your accoun of extraordinary expenses, a comparative state ment of the same expenses for the correspondin quarter of the previous year, according to th form which I enclose; and you will explain a the same time the grounds on which any materia excess of expenditure over that of the corre sponding quarter may have been incurred;" i that done?—That is superseded now.

619. Then may I ask in what way the Foreig Office check these accounts?—If you will hav the goodness to ask the accountant of the Foreig Office, you will get an explanation of thes matters much better from him than from me.

620. I notice in the account of extraordinaries that in France there is an allowance for fuel an light of 1,000*l.*; in Turkey, an allowance o 229*l.*; and in Persia, an allowance of 34*l.*; should like to know, as there is no allowance fo fuel and light in other missions, on what groun this allowance is made to those missions?—Th house in Paris is the property of the Britis Government, and the expense of lighting tha house is so great, that the salary of the ambassado is not equal to meet it. I remember the sum o 1,000*l.* being fixed, in the year 1853, upon a re presentation being made that the expense o keeping the house warm and lighting it was s large. It was arranged with the Treasury tha the ambassador should keep an account of hi expenses for one year, and that upon that accoun an allowance should be fixed. As far as I ca recollect, speaking vaguely, the account was abov 1,000*l.* a year, and it was compromised for 1,000 It was before I was Under Secretary that tha took place.

621. It is put here as 1,006*l.*; but what wanted to know was, why the ambassador a Paris should have an allowance of this kind whe other ambassadors have no such allowance?—I the first place, the ambassador at Paris occu pies a very large house belonging to the Britis Government, and, in the next place, the charg for keeping that house properly warmed an lighted would be too heavy for the ambassado to meet out of the salary allowed to him Whether you give him 1,000*l.* a year more fo his salary, or give it separately for that purpos it will come to the same thing.

622. It is practically the same thing as a increase of salary?—Yes, for the benefit of th public; because, of course, if you let the house for want of being properly warmed, go to ruin the repairs would involve a heavy expenditure.

623. I must direct your attention to the De spatch of Lord Russell to Sir Henry Bulwer, o the 20th of January 1860, in which Lord Russel calls attention to the great increase in extraor dinaries at Constantinople. Among other item is a charge for boats and boatmen and horse hire which was in 1846–7, 454*l.*, and increased i 1858-9 to 1,352*l.* 15*s.* 5*d.* Lord Russell ask for the explanation of that large charge for boat and boatmen, and horse hire; did the Foreig Office ever get an explanation?—I can scarcel remember, as it is so long since, whether we go a satisfactory explanation. The Secretary of Stat did call attention to the point, and the consequenc was, that whereas in 1860 that item was 1,389*l.* in 1861 it was reduced to 1,067*l.*, and in 186

1,056 l., so that the effect was to produce considerable reduction in that item.

624. But are you aware that, after that time, e charge disappears altogether from the Constantinople account?—In 1869, a charge appears 826 l.; in 1868, a charge of 887 l.; and in 1867, charge of 937 l.

625. There is no charge here in the estimate anding the estimate to the Witness)?—I really ust refer you to the chief clerk for these atters. The expense is included now in the inental expenses, I am informed. There has en a material diminution of the aggregate exnditure during the last few years.

626. With regard to Constantinople, there is considerable expenditure still for dragomans, hich comes in the charge of extraordinaries for at mission. The appointment of dragomans at gh salaries, I dare say you are aware, was stified by Lord Palmerston before the Select ommittee of 1850, on the ground that they were ry confidential persons, and were employed in mmunications of the most confidential kind, d therefore they were men of a superior class? Yes.

627. I believe that at that time a few families timately connected supplied dragomans to all e embassies, our own included?—I am not at aware of the connections of any of the agomans of other embassies, or even of our n dragomans. I believe that there was a isani in the Russian embassy, and a Pisani in r embassy. What relationship existed beeen the two I do not know, but all I know is at the Pisani family has been employed for many ears as dragomans in the British service. The evant Company formerly paid all the dragoans, and in 1825 we inherited the dragomans om them.

628. Lord Palmerston stated in his evidence efore that Committee of 1850, that there were rtain families who furnished dragomans to the fferent embassies?—But Lord Palmerston does ot say that they are all furnished from one ock. You are supposing that there is a sort of int stock company of dragomans; I never eard of such a thing.

629. I think you told us when we had the easure of seeing you before, that the dragoans had a common room for discussing these uestions?—They have a waiting room at the orte, I understand, where all the dragomans ait their turn to go in to the foreign minister, st as there is a room in our Foreign Office here the foreign ministers themselves wait ntil the Secretary of State can receive them.

630. I understand from that, that the dragoans could never be safely treated as very condential persons?—My deduction was not that; ut as a general rule I think that conversation n political matters between men in the situation f dragomans of the different embassies may inolve loose conversation, I do not mean loose in he improper sense of the word, but careless conersation on political matters, and lead to matters f business transpiring, which it would be much etter should not occur. I do not know whether have made myself clearly understood to you, ut I know that one of the reasons why the Turkish high ministers preferred communicating irectly either with the ambassador or with a confidential English secretary of the ambassador, vas that they did not come into that talking ociety, if one may use the expression, which would exist in a room full of dragomans. If you have a dozen men congregated together, each eager to pick up for his chief this and that bit of intelligence, you may get something from others it is true, but others may get something from you; and on the whole I should prefer to sacrifice getting something from them to letting them know that which they might get from us. The dragomans' room at Constantinople was, I believe, very much of a gossiping place.

631. I understood you to say that the employment of dragomans in the Turkish mission was now much less necessary than formerly?—For confidential duties.

632. They simply transact ordinary business now, I suppose?—They transact a great deal of high political business still, at least the chief dragoman does. But in former times when I was at Constantinople, the ambassador, being unacquainted with Turkish, was obliged entirely to depend for every communication with the Porte upon his dragoman.

633. Still you would not say now that they were very confidential persons, employed in communications of the most confidential kind, and that they were men of a superior class?—Yes, I would say that of them now as much as ever; I will not say that they are employed in all confidential communications, but I say that they are still employed in communications of the most confidential kind. The difference now is simply this, that while formerly the ambassador was exclusively dependent upon his dragoman, he is not so exclusively dependent upon him now, because he can go to the Porte and talk in French with the Minister for Foreign Affairs.

634. Then you think that the circumstances which you have stated to the Committee are not sufficient to justify any less expenditure on dragomans than was the case at the time that Lord Palmerston gave his evidence?—I think that you must have an equivalent expenditure in some shape or other. If you had a European secretary in the place of a dragoman, you must make his position the same or better than you would the dragoman's position; and that I had always contemplated when the attempt was made to establish a corps of interpreting attachés; I am afraid that if my views had been carried out they would have led to a much larger expenditure than is now incurred for dragomans.

635. I quite understand you to be of opinion that the high salaries which Lord Palmerston justified in 1850 on the grounds which I have quoted, are still necessary to be paid to men in the position of dragomans, although their duty is by no means so important as it was, in communications with the Turkish Government?—Unquestionably.

636. With reference to the Oriental secretary, do you consider that appointment necessary in the mission?—I do.

637. With regard to the Persian expenditure, you have given in a Return of the expenditure for the Persian mission from 1835 to 1869, but I presume that that does not include the Persian extraordinaries which we have been speaking about?—It was obtained from the Treasury, and it includes all the expenditure on account of the Persian mission, except for that year when it was under the Secretary of State for India.

638. Then it includes the amount of extraordinaries?—Yes; we obtained from the Treasury the actual expenses of the missions for those years.

639. In addition to the extraordinary expenses of foreign missions, certain sums are paid, I believe, from year to year for secret service?—There is a certain sum of money issued to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs for secret service generally.

640. The head of a mission draws upon the Secretary of State, does he not, for such sums of money as he may have expended for secret service?—He is empowered to do so.

641. Have you full information in the Foreign Office as to the purposes for which this secret service money is expended?—If any unusual amount was drawn, such information would be asked for, but if an ordinary sum were drawn it would not.

642. Is any control exercised by the Foreign Office with a view of preventing the unnecessary or wasteful expenditure of secret service money by ministers abroad?—I conclude that if an unusual sum were drawn the Secretary of State would ask for an explanation.

643. By whom is the expenditure of secret service money checked in the Foreign Office?—By myself, as Permanent Under Secretary.

644. Does the Parliamentary Under Secretary exercise any supervision over the expenditure of secret service money?—No, he does not. It is entirely between the Secretary of State and myself, but no money is issued to me from the Treasury, but only to the Secretary of State; and on behalf of the Secretary of State I issue the money under the direction of the Secretary of State.

645. The House of Commons, you are perfectly aware, vote that money for that special purpose?—Yes.

646. And the Parliamentary Under Secretary represents the Foreign Office in the House of Commons?—Not necessarily.

647. The only representative of the Foreign Office at the present time in the House of Commons is the Under Secretary; and I want to know how it is that the Parliamentary Under Secretary, representing that office in the House of Commons, has not a voice in the expenditure of this secret service money?—Because in the nature of things no explanation is given to or asked for by Parliament as to the details of the secret service expenditure. If explanations were asked for or given it would cease to be secret service expenditure.

648. Still, as I understand, that expenditure is in a measure under the control of the Foreign Office?—It is entirely controlled by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

649. You do not think that the Parliamentary Under Secretary should have a voice in the control of money voted by Parliament?—It was decided by the Secretary of State 45 years ago that the person under the Secretary of State who should be charged with the disbursement of the money for secret service should be the Permanent Under Secretary, upon the ground that he was a permanent and the other a transient officer, and that it was much better that all the things connected with the secret service should remain within the hands of a person permanently attached to the office than that they should be placed in the hands of a person liable to be changed.

650. That, practically, in reference to this matter, places the Parliamentary Under Secretary in a position of less responsibility and importance than the Permanent Under Secretary?—I do not consider that the Parliamentary Under Secretary or the Permanent Under Secretary have, strictly speaking, any responsibility in the matter. I cannot spend a halfpenny of the secret service money without the express authority of the Secretary of State. I render my own account to the Secretary of State, but it is the account of the Secretary of State which is rendered under the statute to the Audit Office.

651. The Parliamentary Under Secretary of State would have to justify an extraordinary expenditure for that service in the House of Commons, and yet he would have no more knowledge than I have of it?—Certainly; but then I presume that the House of Commons would never question the expenditure as long as we keep within the vote.

652. Chairman.] Are you aware what the rule is in the offices of the other Secretaries of State?—The Act of Parliament, which is called the Civil List Act, applies to all Secretaries of State, and to the Admiralty.

653. There is a certain amount of secret service money in the Home Office, for instance?—Yes, and it would come under the same regulation; I believe that it is administered by the Permanent Under Secretary in the same manner. Strictly speaking, the only person known in the administration of the secret service money, as regards the Foreign Office, is the Secretary of State. All the money is issued to the Secretary of State, and it is his account, not mine, that is rendered to the Audit Office.

654. You keep an account of that expenditure?—I keep an account of it.

655. But it is a private account between you and the Secretary of State?—Yes; but the public account is the one which the Secretary of State renders.

656. Mr. Rylands.] How does the thing stand in the case of the other departments; we will take the Colonial Department, for instance; I presume that secret service money might be spent in the Colonial Department?—Parliament provides for secret service money being spent by any Secretary of State.

657. But would not that bring in the Parliamentary Under Secretaries of State?—I really cannot tell; I can only answer for my own office; I should be surprised if it did.

658. You do not know whether the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for the Home Department would be precluded from investigating the expenditure for secret service in that department?—I presume the same rule would hold there; I think that it would be a very improper thing for any Under Secretary of State to be empowered to investigate the accounts of the Secretary of State. The money is not issued to the Under Secretary, but to the Secretary of State, and it would rather be an inversion of the usual order of things to allow any Under Secretary to call the Secretary of State to account.

659. Is it not right for the Under Secretary of State to call the people to account who have expended this money?—No, certainly not.

660. Does nobody call them to account?—The Secretary of State would, if necessary.

661. Does the Secretary of State do it?—You must first prove that there is an unusual expenditure; I do not admit that there is.

662. I understood

662. I understood you to say that the control as in the Secretary of State, acting through u, as Under Secretary?—Acting through me, Under Secretary, because I draw the drafts pay the expenditure.

663. You also said that you had some check er it?—My check would be to report to the ecretary of State if I saw anything which I ought wrong, but leaving the Secretary of tate to judge if it was wrong. It is not for me call any foreign minister to account for anyiing; the Secretary of State is the sole person the office who has authority to do that.

664. Practically, you would call his attention the matter?—As I should call his attention to ything going on in the office which I thought as wrong.

665. But the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State is excluded from any voice in this matter?—Yes, under the regulation laid down by Mr. Secretary Canning. Rt. Hon. E. Hammond. 21 March 1870.

666. Is it a fact, that since the date of Mr. Canning no Parliamentary Under Secretary has been allowed to take part in the supervision of this money?—That is a question that I cannot answer.

667. Within your experience is it a fact?—Within my experience of 16 years no other person but the Secretary of State and myself has had anything to do with the administration of that fund. Mr. Secretary Canning considered it better that the knowledge of the details of that expenditure should be brought within as narrow a compass as possible.

The Right Honourable JAMES HOWARD, Earl of MALMESBURY (attending by permission of the House of Lords); Examined.

668. Chairman.] YOUR Lordship has been ecretary of State for Foreign Affairs?—Yes, vice. Right Hon. the Earl of Malmesbury.

669. For what period?—I served under Lord erby's Government in 1852, and afterwards in 858 and 1859.

670. I think, also, that your Lordship gave vidence before the Committee, in 1861, on this ubject of the diplomatic service?—I did.

671. Are you aware of the existing arrangeents with regard to promotion in the service, nd entrance into the service?—I believe that ome alterations have been made in the condiions, since I was Secretary of State, with espect to examinations, and details of that kind. could not give the Committee any information s to the new conditions.

672. Your Lordship is aware, generally, that system of examination has been introduced or entrance into the diplomatic service?—Yes.

673. May I ask you whether you are disposed o approve of that system?—Certainly.

674. It has been suggested, that the examinaion should be one of open competition. Should ou be disposed to approve of that?—I should ot approve of that for the Foreign Office, howver desirable it might be for some others. I hink that it is of a peculiar character, and that nen of a peculiar position, and of a certain class f education, should be appointed to the diplonatic service.

675. Mr. Hammond has expressed an opinion, hat gentlemen of a higher class of life are preerable for that service to those who would come n under open competition. Is that your Lordhip's opinion?—That is the case, certainly, in Europe.

676. You think that the service abroad would e disparaged if it were not supplied from that lass in the higher diplomatic branches?—I hink so.

677. Have you considered whether it would e desirable to make a University degree a conlition of entering the diplomatic service?—I think that having got a degree ought, as far as it goes, to be a recommendation for a man.

678. At the time when your Lordship made appointments to the diplomatic service, did that ever enter into your consideration in selecting the young men who were to enter the service?—I think not, because they were too young, most of them, to have taken a degree.

679. Did you find that there was a great pressure for admission into the service?—Yes, there was a great pressure at that time, although they were not paid.

680. On the question of salaries, does your Lordship think that the salaries are made adequate or inadequate, or more than adequate?—I do not think that they are inadequate, but I do not think that they are too high, in consequence of the extraordinary rise in prices within the last 10 or 15 years abroad. I think that the prices abroad, in Europe (I speak of Europe only), must be certainly 30 or 40 per cent. more than they were 20 years ago.

681. Have you a general familiarity with the state of things abroad from personal knowledge?—I have been abroad every year for 40 years.

682. And that is the result of your own experience?—Yes, I know it from my own experience.

683. In selecting young men for the service, did you make it any condition that they were to be gentlemen of adequate independent means, or was that question left at large?—It was left at large; I did not inquire into it.

684. Is is possible even when a diplomatic servant becomes a paid servant of the State for him to live on the ordinary salary which he receives from the public as second secretary or a third secretary?—Not as a third secretary, certainly.

685. It requires therefore that they should have independent means of their own?—Certainly.

686. That necessarily is a very considerable limit upon any general competition for such a service?—It ought to be, but perhaps it is not considered by people ambitious to have their sons put into the service; they are not aware of how expensive a thing it is, and very often they regret it, and the young men have found that they could not live on what they had.

687. Were you aware when you were Foreign Secretary of State, of complaints of inadequacy of salary on the part of those who had salaries?—Yes, some complained.

688. Was the China service established at the time when your Lordship was at the office?—It was.

689. I think

Right Hon. the Earl of Malmesbury.

21 March 1870.

689. I think it was established during your time of office?—It was. I sent out 12 young men, or rather youths, to learn the language. They were distributed in China, Siam, and Japan.

690. In order that the diplomatic service might be independent of the natives?—That they might be of use to their principals. Some of them have become consuls since.

691. Are you aware how that has worked subsequently?—I have never heard anything against it, and I have heard that two or three of them have turned out extremely well, and have been very useful servants.

692. Have those gentlemen been retained in the service, do you know?—Yes. One died the other day who was a very distinguished servant, a gentleman of the name of Fletcher.

693. May I ask your Lordship, generally in making selections of young men for attachés, what rule you pursued with regard to the persons you selected; were they people of whom you had personal knowledge, or were they recommended to you by those whom you could trust?—They generally had recommendations from their tutors or from clergymen who had educated them, or from some other persons. I always made somebody responsible for the appointment, besides the father of the candidate.

694. You looked to the character as well as at attainments, I presume?—Yes, certainly.

695. And you consider that essential in making selections for the service?—Very essential.

696. Is a great deal of the business which passes through the hands of these gentlemen of a very confidential nature?—It is entirely confidential; I believe they see all the despatches which pass.

697. Are there occasionally matters in which, if the business was not conducted very honourably, very large sums of money might be obtained by the disclosure of information?—Yes.

698. And therefore it is essential that a gentleman in the service should have a high sense of honour?—Yes, and a strong esprit de corps for the honour of the service.

699. Do you think that the suggestion of having a staff of clerks at the foreign missions, with a skilled head of the nature of the present heads, would be an adequate substitute for the present system?—I do not see how you would gain by it economically, for you must pay the clerks as much in most of the European missions as you pay the secretaries; and the clerks would probably not have means of their own as extensive as the present secretaries have. And when some very confidential business had to be carried out I should be afraid that the chief would make a difference between the two classes, which would occasion jealousy; he would not employ the clerks, but only the secretaries on such business. I do not see the advantage of it; on the contrary, I think it would be disadvantageous.

700. There has been a suggestion made of having at the larger missions a permanent officer in charge of the records, so that there might be some regular charge taken of them. Has that ever been suggested to you?—You mean, I presume a sort of keeper of the archives. I think that in the large missions there ought to be always a permanent man to take care of the papers and documents.

701. That is not the case as we understand at present?—No, it used to be so at Paris.

702. Are you aware that there is what is called a block in the promotion of the profession at present?—Certainly.

703. Have you ever considered any mea... for remedying that?—I think that the chief cause of the block is the fact that the Secretaries of State have appointed too many attachés, and filled up the service too rapidly; I think it might be relieved now in this way; I have no doubt that there are some of the secretaries and attachés who would be glad to accept consular missions rather than wait many years for a diplomatic one, and some of those might be named as soon as consular posts were open. And at the same time the block might be relieved by checking the creation of new attachés; in fact acting as you would in the army or navy.

704. You would reduce the existing establishment by degrees?—Yes, gradually, without interfering with vested interests.

705. Has any system of compulsory retirement after a number of years' service ever suggested itself to you?—No, because the diplomatic service is one in which a man, unless he is in very bad health, can go on to almost any age. There is no great physical exertion required.

706. It only requires skill and experience?—Yes, and the older a man gets the more experience he acquires.

707. Have you found in your experience of the diplomatic service that there is a considerable jealousy of the importation of strangers in a higher position into the profession; that objection is made to missions being filled up by gentlemen who have not been trained to the profession?—Very naturally, because it breaks the thread of their regular promotion.

708. What was the doctrine held by your Lordship when you were Secretary of State in that respect?—It was held that the Secretary of State always had the power to appoint strangers to missions, but it was always a very unpopular thing to do.

709. Had you occasion to do it at all yourself?—No, not to appoint entire strangers. It was a doctrine that the Secretary of State was justified in recalling any ministers or ambassadors who were of a different party from himself, supposing those ambassadors to be Peers who had voted during their tenor of office against his party.

710. Supposing, that is to say, that they were politicians and partisans?—Yes; but now that proxies are not used they could not do that.

711. I think in my recollection, and I suppose in your Lordship's recollection, the embassy at Paris was always considered an appointment for a party man more than for the general diplomatic service?—Yes.

712. When did that cease?—It ceased when Lord Cowley was appointed, I think.

713. Did your Lordship find Lord Cowley there when you became Secretary of State, and did you then continue him there?—Yes; he was considered as quite a neutral man.

714. That, in point of fact, broke the practice?—It broke the practice.

715. Did the same doctrine apply to any of the other principal missions, such as St. Petersburg, or Vienna; do you remember?—Not in my time; I do not recollect it.

716. So that, practically, in more recent times it has become more of a close profession than it was formerly?—Certainly. During the last half of of the last century it was entirely political, and changed with every Government.

717. I think your Lordship's grandfather was sent by his political friends as a minister?—Yes; he was employed by both parties.

718. Viscount Barrington.] Am I to gather from what your Lordship has just stated, that you are of opinion that the diplomatic service ought to be looked upon as a profession?—I think certainly it should; there is really a great deal of technical matter to be learnt, besides experience of foreign countries and foreign courts; and I do not think that it would ever do, even if the heads of missions were strangers, to have perfect strangers appointed to the lower posts.

719. And that being the case, are you of opinion that the higher posts should be changed when the Government changes, from one party to another?—I think not; I think that the spirit which ought to be felt in that profession should be one entirely of duty, and that all party feeling ought to be eliminated, just as our commanders by sea or land are no longer political men, as they used to be; there should be a feeling that the men filling these posts in the diplomatic service are quite neutral.

720. I think I understood your Lordship to say that you did not consider the salaries were too high?—Certainly not too high.

721. And do you think that the salaries of the junior members ought to be increased according to their length of service?—I think it would be fair, and certainly desirable; I think that the salaries of many of them are too low, unless you make it a rule that no man should enter the service without a certain private fortune, and that would not be possible.

722. Your Lordship is aware that under the present system, supposing that the chief is absent from his mission, a reduction is made in his salary during that time, and a proportionate increase is given to the secretary who remains there; have you an opinion that any advantage would accrue to the diplomatic service by a change being made in that respect?—I think that to fine the principal in that manner is a most clumsy way of paying the secretaries of legation; the object of the former Committees of your House was positively to encourage the heads of missions to visit England every year; and you would find in the Report of the last Committee on this subject that they say that no impediment should be placed in the way of that. Well, it becomes a very great impediment to a man who has no private fortune of his own to have to pay what on the average is 4*l.* a day during the time of his two months' (60 days) leave; the consequence is, to my knowledge, that many of them do not avail themselves, because they cannot afford to avail themselves, of their leave of absence.

723. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] Is it not 60 days' leave without deduction, and after 60 days with the deduction?—No, certainly not; there is a scale. If a minister or ambassador has 10,000*l.* a year, he pays 6*l.* a day for every one of his 60 days, and he is not allowed his travelling expenses. If he has 8,000*l.* he pays 5*l.* a day; if 6,000*l.* he pays 4*l.*; if 5,000*l.* he pays 4*l.*; and if 4,000*l.* he pays 4*l.* So we may put the average at 4*l.* a day, which makes about 240*l.* as the sum which he pays for taking his leave.

724. Chairman.] Besides the expense of the journey home?—Besides the expense of the journey home. If it is the opinion of the Committee of your House that they should come home every year to refresh themselves with English ideas, that is a great impediment, and I know some who from that cause do not come home. And then this sort of conversation I have heard more than once. A secretary of embassy or legation is appointed to some post, and he is asked where he is going, and he says, "To such and such a post." "Oh, that is a very bad one; that is one of the worst, because the minister never moves," is the reply; the fact being that he cannot afford to move. Or, if it is the contrary, the secretary is congratulated upon going to a minister who always takes his leave. And the present arrangement is founded also upon a ground which is not quite in accordance with the fact. I think, in their Report, the Committee say that the chargé d'affaire left behind at the post is obliged to represent. Now I do not think that he is obliged to represent; I do not think that he is put to any more expense than when his chief is present. He lives at his lodgings, if he is not married, or if he is married he does not increase his establishment; and if it is thought that he should be paid more, I do not think it fair that it should be taken from the minister. We should think it very extraordinary if when the colonel of a regiment took his leave he had to pay a major so much, and the major the captain, and so on; and I do not know any other branch of the public service, civil or military, in which such a plan is followed.

725. Viscount Barrington.] To turn to another subject; with regard to the smaller European missions, has your Lordship ever taken into consideration the question whether they could be amalgamated with advantage to the public service; the smaller missions, for instance, in Germany, and in the north of Europe, Denmark, and Sweden?—Denmark and Sweden I really do not think it possible to amalgamate, because it very often has happened that their interests have been directly at variance, and that they have even been at war with one another, and they are perfectly independent countries. There is one small mission in Germany, Stuttgardt, which might perhaps be suppressed, or rendered more economical by having only a chargé d'affaires at it; but I do not know any other that strikes me; I do not think it would do to turn our back upon Switzerland, although that might be called a small mission. It is a perfectly independent country.

726. Chairman.] It is a very important political post, is it not?—A very important political post. I may say as to information, that the two most important pieces of information that I ever received whilst I was at the Foreign Office came from the small stations, one from Hanover, and one from Switzerland.

727. Viscount Barrington.] Would your Lordship object to state what that information was?—I do not see any objection to stating it. In the first instance, it was when we thought that we had prevented the Italian war; the French Emperor had induced Cavour to disarm, and we hoped that it was going to be all settled amicably by a congress, but the Austrians broke through everything, and crossed the Ticino. We had the information of their intention to do that through Hanover many days before it was known to any other court. The other instance was that of information which I received from Switzerland, a month before it was known or suspected that the Emperor Napoleon meant to annex Savoy. They were both authentic pieces of information, and were given some time before any of the larger missions knew anything about either of them.

Right Hon. the Earl of Malmesbury.

728. With regard to the present constitution of the Foreign Office, does your Lordship think that it is on a good footing, or that it should be altered in any kind of way?—When I was there I found everything go on very smoothly; gentlemen were extremely attentive to their business, and there was a very excellent esprit de corps. At times there was a great deal of work, and the office was open till eight or nine o'clock, necessarily so, and I never heard anybody grumble; on the contrary, they all worked with the greatest possible zeal and conscientiousness.

729. Is the Parliamentary Under Secretary on the same footing as the permanent Under Secretary in the office?—The permanent Under Secretary is the minister of the interior of the office; he has the entire management of the discipline of the office, and everything that goes on within the walls.

730. Do you think that any improvement could be introduced into the consular service?—I should think so. I have never studied the subject, but I know that that service might be reformed with advantage. There are places where I think consuls are not needed, and there are others where there are no consuls where there ought to be one.

731. Chairman.] That service would require a careful revision?—A very careful revision.

732. Viscount Sandon.] Might I ask your Lordship, with regard to the junior members of the diplomatic service, whether you think that it is for the good of the country that for the first four years they should receive no pay?—I do not see any objection to their not receiving any pay excepting this, that it confines the choice to rich men, which is not altogether desirable.

733. I suppose I am right in imagining that the position of an unpaid attaché is worse than it was formerly, inasmuch as formerly he was habitually boarded, you may say, at the ambassador's table?—I do not remember their being habitually boarded at the ambassador's table; that depended very much on the hospitality of the individual who was at the head of the mission.

734. With regard to the visits to England, that your Lordship mentioned as being desirable for the higher members of the diplomatic profession, would you say that it was equally desirable for the public service that junior members should visit England pretty frequently?—Yes, I think so; I think that Lord Palmerston's expression was, that they ought to be periodically dipped into the stream of English opinions.

735. At present, I think, those of subordinate rank have to pay the expenses of their journeys home and back to their posts?—I am not sure about that; the junior members, I believe, are allowed something for their journey, but the ministers are not allowed anything.

736. In point of fact, it is desirable for the public service that both the senior and the junior members should be periodically dipped into English society?—Certainly; and that is an opinion strongly laid down in your former Report.

737. And that, therefore, there should not be a virtual fine on the journey to England?—Certainly there should not.

738. With regard to the smaller missions in the German courts, are you decidedly of opinion that the service to the public of the information which comes to the Foreign Office from those courts counterbalances, in fact, the annual cost of maintaining those missions?—I believe that there is but one such case now, and that is Stuttgardt, and that must be a very small item.

739. Coburg and Dresden also?—There are no ministers there.

740. Lord Palmerston, I think, spoke very strongly on that subject, and your Lordship would endorse that opinion, I imagine?—Yes, I think that the more eyes there are the better.

741. Then with regard to the South American missions, is it your impression that the interests of this country have suffered from our maintaining those missions on a lower scale than those of other countries?—Yes, I think they certainly have.

742. The interests that we have with those countries are principally commercial interests?—Yes.

743. And those commercial interests have been growing with great rapidity during the last few years?—Yes.

744. Therefore your Lordship's impression would be that the commercial interests of a country would be better protected in fact by having the missions on a larger scale than those are?—Yes, I think so; and I think that the Spaniards are people who feel that very much; they look very much to being put upon the same footing as European states.

745. Might I ask your Lordship, with regard to what has been said of the salaries of American ministers, whether from your experience you would say that the American missions, with which you have been brought into contact diplomatically, have suffered from the low scale of remuneration that they have received, as compared with that afforded to our ministers?—I have heard complaints from American ministers here of the low rate at which they were paid.

746. Because it impeded their showing and receiving hospitality on the same footing as their diplomatic brothers?—Yes.

747. And therefore, to a certain degree, the interests of the United States may be supposed to have suffered from that cause?—Yes.

748. Of course the system of telegraphic communication has made some change in the relations between the Home Government and the diplomatic ministers abroad; would your Lordship say that on that account it was no longer necessary to have such large diplomatic staffs at the different courts?—I think that cause would act principally upon the staff of messengers and correspondents. In 1859, when the telegraphs were only in their infancy, I was able to reduce the expense of messengers by, I think, nearly 11,000 l. a year; but I do not know how much further that could be carried.

749. With regard to the actual staff for the missions, your Lordship does not suppose that their work has been diminished by the great extention of telegraphy?—I should think they have as much trouble in deciphering telegrams as they used to have in copying a despatch.

750. With regard to the responsibility of the ministers abroad, has it been so much lessened by the possibility of telegraphic communication from the minister at home, that you require a minister minister of lower qualifications, and therefore of lower salary, at your foreign missions?—There is no doubt that the responsibility has diminished very much indeed, as a minister can receive his orders in 24 hours, but I do not know that that is a reason for paying him less; he has got to carry those orders out, and has also got to act in many cases upon his own opinion and judgment.

751. And I conclude that in the case of most of the ministers in the important courts, it is not so much a matter of instant action as of constant daily discretion?—Certainly,

752. And of tact in intercourse with the leading men of the various countries?—Yes.

753. So that the mere fact of relieving a minister of responsibility on the great crises of public affairs, would not make it the less necessary that he should be a man of weight and of a leading character?—Certainly not; he would have to carry out very delicate instructions just the same.

754. May I ask your Lordship whether the second time that you had the control of Foreign Affairs, you did not find that there was a considerable increase of business in the Foreign Office, from the growth of commercial relations between this country and the rest of the world?—Yes, certainly.

755. And that entailed a great amount of business, both on the Foreign Office and on the diplomatic agents abroad?—Yes.

756. There is one other question which I will venture to ask, which is, whether you have not known many serious international complications which have been likely to lead to war, but in which war has been prevented by the diplomatic action of the ministers of this country in a way which has been quite unknown to public opinion outside?—Yes, there are instances of that sort.

757. Very often transactions are going on of which the outer public are unaware, which are of vital importance to this country in preventing the probabilities of war at the very beginning?—Yes, and which require the greatest secrecy, or else they would not succeed.

758. Therefore we could not judge of the advantage of the diplomatic service to the country merely from the transactions that come to light in the public press?—No, certainly not.

759. Mr. Arthur Russell.] With regard to that last question, would you not say that if one war were prevented in a generation this country would have an ample return for the money expended in the diplomatic service?—Certainly it would tenfold.

760. Your Lordship said that the present block might be remedied by the promotion of the younger members to vacant consulates; could that be done without injury to the existing consuls?—I think that there are many young men fit for a consular post; and if they would accept it, and give up the ambition of going on in the diplomatic line, I have no doubt that you could find fit men.

761. I am referring to the interests of existing consuls; would not their interests be affected by the promotion of men of the diplomatic staff?—I should not dismiss any consul that was doing his duty to put them in, but as the consulates fell vacant I think it would be a way of lightening the burden of secretaries weighing upon us to appoint some of them to the posts.

762. But the vice consuls look forward to promotion, do they not?—I do not think they do necessarily; they are not all of them the same class of men as the consuls.

763. Mr. Cartwright.] In the event of such a fusion of the diplomatic and consular services, do not you think that the block which at present exists in the diplomatic service would be transferred into the consular branch?—No, I think not; you would lighten the diplomatic service, and, supposing the consular service to remain as it is, there are no candidates for the consular service analogous to the secretaries; you would merely fill up the vacancies in the consular service by putting secretaries in, instead of taking persons from the population at large.

764. Then your Lordship is not aware that the vice consuls enter the service with aspirations for, or with a view to, promotion generally, but you think that they are content to keep that post, and do not look to advancement?—I cannot say what they hope and expect, but many of them, who make very good vice consuls, would not do as consuls.

765. I think, if I understood rightly, your Lordship suggested the propriety of a minister, when he came home, not having any deduction made from his salary to go to the secretary of the mission?—Certainly.

766. In the event of the secretary remaining chargé d'affaires for two months, he would receive no addition to his salary, according to your proposition?—I have drawn up a memorandum upon that subject which, with the permission of the Chairman, I will leave with the Committee, and in that you will find that I would allow the chargé d'affaires some increase of salary during that period.

767. In the evidence which your Lordship gave in 1861, you expressed a very decided opinion in favour of clerks being appointed at the greater missions. I think your Lordship is still of that opinion, if I understoood your answers aright?—I think that, in the larger missions, it would be useful to have an assistant clerk to keep the archives, who should be a permanent clerk.

768. But only in the larger missions?—I should hardly think it necessary in the others.

769. Mr. Holms.] You have stated, I think, that you are of opinion that the mission at Stuttgardt might be suppressed?—I said that that was the only small one left, and that I did not see any very important reason why it should not be suppressed; but I do not consider Sweden and Denmark, or Brussels and the Hague, as small missions. I think them very important.

770. But do you not believe that the mission at Munich might be reduced to a position of only having a secretary of legation there under the control of our ambassador at Vienna, which is only 250 miles from it?—I should prefer having a responsible minister at Munich in the present state of Germany, certainly.

771. Do you think that it is necessary for us to maintain a chargé d'affaires at Coburg and at Dresden?—I think that there should be one at Dresden, that is nominally an independent country.

772. At Coburg do you think it is essentially necessary to have one?—I think he is useful in obtaining general information. As I said before, the more eyes there are the better, and I do not believe that it is very expensive.

773. It is only a very short distance from

Right Hon. the Earl of Malmesbury.

21 March 1870.

Dresden, namely, 150 miles, and only 150 miles from Darmstadt. Is it essentially necessary that we should have at a distance of only 150 miles from two points, another representative?—It is not the distance that makes the difference. You may be only 10 miles from a country, and yet that country may be as different from the country in which you are in all its ideas, opinions, position, and everything, as if it were a thousand miles off; I do not think that the distance signifies.

774. Are the American ministers, according to your experience, as well received at European courts as our own ministers?—I should not like the Americans to read my answer, but I do not think they are.

775. Mr. Baring.] Is your Lordship prepared to recommend any change in the present system which would either increase the efficiency or diminish the expense of the diplomatic service?—No, I do not think that the expense can be diminished to any sensible degree, doing justice to the service and to the men in it.

776. Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke.] Would your Lordship put Stuttgardt and Coburg on the same footing, or do you consider that Coburg is a more valuable post to retain than Stuttgardt?—No, I think not; I think that Stuttgardt is quite as valuable, if not more so.

777. I thought that your Lordship said that Stuttgardt might possibly be abolished; that you saw no great inconvenience in abolishing that post?—I do not think that the inconvenience would be very great if you kept a chargé d'affaires there.

778. Nor in the case of Coburg?—Nor in the case of Coburg. Only if you diminish those small posts, as I have said before, you diminish the number of watch dogs that you have.

779. Mr. Kinnaird.] Do you think it is a good thing for a minister to remain a great many years in one mission, or do you rather think it is desirable, for the sake of the service and information, that they should be moving on?—I do not think it is a good thing that they should remain a great many years in a single place. They become imbued with the ideas of the country that they live in, and that is not desirable, although, of course, they ought to understand their prejudices and not offend them. I think that they ought to be changed after a certain number of years.

780. But I think that at Coburg there has been a resident minister for a very great number of years without moving?—Yes; I know the case that you allude to.

781. Is it not rather hard upon the service when a Minister remains so long, and prevents any promotion?—If you want to get rid of him, and so lighten the pressure which prevents promotion, you must pension him, and then he does nothing, and you have to pay him for that.

782. Then, as I understand, there is no existing means of disposing of a minister for the benefit of the State, except by pension; if it had been thought desirable he might have been moved before this; you had full power to move him if you wished, in the interests of the public service?—Yes.

783. How comes it that a man has been able to retain that retirement there so long through so many Governments?—The place suited him, and I think that he suited the place, if I understand to whom you are alluding.

784. You spoke of the reduction in the expenditure which you were able to make consequent upon the telegraphic service being so improved; and I think you are of opinion that more might now be done owing to the same cause?—I could not answer as to that, because I do not know at all what the staff is.

785. Do you think that the whole system of the Foreign Office messengers, as at present constituted, is as well adapted to our times as it was to former periods?—It was altered by me very much, and they were put upon a different footing.

786. And you think that something still might be done in that direction?—I do not know what footing they are on now.

787. There was no difficulty in effecting that change, I think?—Only the difficulty in effecting all changes, that they were dissatisfied, of course.

788. But it was very much an advantage to the public service?—Yes.

789. Mr. Eastwick.] In making appointments to the diplomatic service, I suppose you would consider it rather a recommendation for a young man to have taken a university degree?—Yes; but then he must be older than many who are now appointed. Necessarily he must be a man of 22 or 23.

790. I think your Lordship did make appointments of that sort; I think Mr. Fane had taken his degree at Oxford?—Yes.

791. And I suppose that taking a high degree would be no disadvantage in your Lordship's eyes?—On the contrary.

792. Also the fact of a man having been at the university would be, in some degree, a certificate of his having the necessary property qualifications as far as it went?—Yes, I suppose so.

793. Does your Lordship think that it would be desirable to make a distinct line of demarcation between the consular and the diplomatic services, independent of this block that now exists?—There is a line of demarcation, but it is not a fixed line, because there have been instances often of consuls becoming Ministers.

794. But of course there would be a very different class of men for the consular service from those who are generally appointed to the diplomatic service?—Generally.

795. And the property qualification would not be required in the consular service?—In some consulates they are very ill paid, considering the prices obtaining in the countries in which they are.

796. Does your Lordship see any objection to appointing junior diplomatic officers to hold inland consularships, independently of the present block in the service?—That is what I have suggested; that some of the attachés should be appointed, to relieve the pressure.

797. In point of fact, a man entering the consular service has not the same reasons for looking to promotion in the service as a man entering the diplomatic service has?—No, there is no regular succession of promotion.

798. I think your Lordship was Minister when the superintendence of one mission in Persia was transferred to the India Office?—I was.

799. Your Lordship approved of that transference at the time?—I did; I thought it right; but I believe that it has been re-transferred.

800. Mr. Richard Shaw.] Your Lordship stated that there is a block in the diplomatic service, rvice, and you suggested that the consular partment should be opened to relieve that lock; do you make that suggestion in the interest of the public service, or simply as a remedy r the block?—If you could get some of the secretaries to relinquish their diplomatic service by fering them consulates, I believe that there ust be men in the diplomatic service perfectly to fill those posts, and the country would be ually well served by them as consuls, whilst would relieve the block of which you speak.

801. But are not the duties of the two departents separate and distinct; is not the consular partment essentially commercial, and the diploatic essentially political?—I think that there nothing in the usual consulships but what any ntelligent secretary who had had some experince of business might perfectly well carry on.

802. Are not the examinations for admission the different services distinct?—Now, I beeve, they are.

803. Are you aware that the Consular Comittee of 1858 reported specially against the uggestion that you have just made?—No, I was ot aware of that.

804. Would not such change be opposed to all revious practice?—The converse, as I have told ou just now, has been done; that is to say, a onsul has been promoted to the diplomatic serice; but I do not know any instance of an ttaché being sent to a consulship.

805. But are not those instances of consuls eing appointed to a higher service of very rare ccurrence?—I think there are several such ases.

806. Would not the effect of your suggestion be to stop promotion in the consular service?—No, I think not.

807. Is it not natural to suppose that a gentleman who has accepted the appointment of vice consul at a small salary will expect in the course of time to be rewarded by one of the higher appointments in the consulates?—And some of them are; but it would mislead you if I were to say that a vice consul, because he is a vice consul, is fit to be a consul. That is not the case.

808. That may be true, but is it not natural to suppose that the vice consuls hope to gain promotion if their services and their intelligence are sufficient to justify their promotion?—In his own mind, no doubt, if a vice consul thinks he is fit for it, he hopes to get it; but the Secretary of State would not necessarily be of the same opinion.

809. But would not the effect of adopting your suggestion of the introduction of attachés to consulships have a tendency to stop that promotion?—No, I do not think so.

810. If you appoint attachés to consulships you introduce fresh blood into the service; would not the effect of that be to stop the promotion of those already in the service?—But you must take fresh blood now. If two or three consulships become vacant fresh blood must come from somewhere.

Right Hon. the Earl of Malmesbury.

21 March 1870.

811. But if the vice consuls are fit to be promoted, and are promoted, you get fresh blood by appointing fresh men to the vice consulships?—You are going upon the assumption that the vice consul should always be promoted to the consulship.

812. No, I do not say that he should always be promoted, but I go upon the assumption that there are a great number of our vice consuls receiving now salaries of 400*l.* or 500*l.* a year, who in course of time and from experience would be fitted to discharge the higher duties of consuls, is not that so?—They are constantly promoted.

813. Then I ask you the question, if you relieve the block in the diplomatic service by introducing attachés to consulships, would that not in effect be stopping the promotion in the consular department?—You would aid the promotion in the diplomatic service, and I suppose that you would economise to a certain degree in that service, but at the same time the country would not at all suffer from your putting an attaché into a consulship instead of taking a man out of the population for the purpose.

814. Do you not think that it would create great dissatisfaction amongst the consular servants of this country?—I do not see that their dissatisfaction would be greater than the dissatisfaction that now exists in the hopeless state in which the attachés are now, in the diplomatic service. It is only by some means of that sort, I think, that you can relieve the present block, unless you buy out the secretaries, and that would not be economical.

815. But the block in the diplomatic department, I understood you to say, had been caused by an excess of appointments?—I think that that is one of the reasons.

816. If we had a cessation of appointments now, would not the block be relieved in the course of time?—Of course it would.

817. Do not you think that that would be a much more just course to take than to attempt to relieve the block in the diplomatic department at the expense of the consular department?—I think that the best way would be to stop the appointments in the diplomatic service for a time, and if it was found practicable to reduce the diplomatic service in the way which I mention, it might be a benefit to the country.

The Right Honourable Sir HENRY GEORGE ELLIOT, G.C.B., called in; and Examined.

Right Hon. Sir H. G. Elliot, G.C.B.

24 March 1870.

818. Chairman.] YOU are Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople?—Yes.

819. You are at home on leave at present?—Yes.

820. On that question of leave, have you anything to say to the Committee?—I think that our position has been very much improved by the late regulation; but I do not exactly see why there should be the distinction that there is between the chiefs and the juniors with regard to running two years' leave into one. I do not see why we should be limited to one year's leave, or why we should be deprived of all time allowance for our journeys.

821. Will you explain the distinction between the chiefs and the subordinates, to which you are referring?—Any secretary who remained more than two years at his post would be entitled to four months' leave from Constantinople, and would be allowed 30 days' travelling time, making altogether five months, you may say.

822. He is allowed to throw two years' leave into one?—Yes, and is allowed time for travelling, a month or 28 days. Now, if I were to remain five years or 10 years at my post, I should be entitled to 60 days, including the whole time that was taken up in travelling, which you must put down at a month in the case of a man travelling with a family. I can hardly go to Constantinople in much less than a fortnight; so that I should only get in England about 30 days' leave, with a deduction from my salary of what is necessary for the chargé d'affaires; after that I should be put upon half-pay.

823. If you got the permission of the head of the office to the prolongation of your leave, then you are put on half pay?—That is the regulation at present.

824. What you would suggest is, that the heads of missions should be treated on the same footing as the secretaries in respect of leave?—Yes, I think it would be but fair.

825. Are you aware of any public reason why there was a difference made originally?—I imagine that the public reason was that there used to be a grant for the diplomatic service, and that the fine that was imposed upon the chiefs for being away from their posts went rather to add to that sum, and it was worth having; I believe that was the reason of it. When you are at a distance from home any deduction comes very heavily upon you. You certainly cannot travel with a family from Constantinople back to England for less than 200 l. to 250 l., so that the two journeys come to 500 l., independent of any deduction of salary.

826. You are also liable to deduction for the chargé d'affaires?—At all times; even from the first day of your departure you suffer that deduction.

827. How long have you been in the profession?—I began as précis writer to Lord Palmerston in 1840, and then I was appointed paid attaché at St. Petersburg in 1841. I have been close upon 30 years in the profession.

828. The change which has been made of having secretaries instead of attachés, and paying them at a certain period of their service, has been made during your experience?—Yes. The great change that was made was, not in altering their titles (for that was of very little importance), but in giving them commissions as second and third secretaries, which in my own particular case would have had a very decided effect; for when I had been 20 years in the service, in consequence of having been a paid attaché instead of a second secretary holding a commission, on the suppression of the mission at Naples at the time of the revolution there, I was for three years out of the service altogether, during which time I neither got pay nor pension. There was Mr. William Stewart, who was my secretary, who had been also a long time in the service, and he was in the same condition.

829. The time would count for a pension, would it not?—The time that we had served as attachés, not holding commissions, did not count for our pensions, and therefore neither of us was qualified. I had not served, nor had he, 15 years from the date of the first commission.

830. If you had entered under the old arrangement, you would have been 15 years longer in qualifying?—No; under the old arrangement, in two two or three years I should have been due for my pension.

831. Has there been a change in the character and nature of diplomacy since you joined the service, in the way of its becoming more of a close and definite profession?—It is much more a close profession in this sense, that since the examinations were established, we have lost what I think was the advantage of having a number of young men coming into it, who did perfectly well for all the copying work and the earlier branches, but who had no intention of going on to the higher branches; the result being that the promotion among those who meant to make it their profession was at that time much more rapid than at present.

832. A great number of gentlemen became unpaid attachés then, who never intended to follow the profession?—Yes, and therefore those who went in with the idea of following the profession had fewer rivals.

833. The change in that respect has crowded the entrance to the higher positions?—Yes, very much, and made promotion a great deal slower.

834. Do you think that it was a desirable thing to have a number of young gentlemen in the profession who did not intend to follow it up, and were therefore more or less idlers?—Yes, I think on the whole it was an advantage; I think that they did the work that they were called upon to do perfectly satisfactorily, and that you got gratuitously a great deal of work that was done quite willingly.

835. Now the examination practically chokes those all off?—Now the examination chokes off those who do not mean to make it their permanent profession; but I think that that might be rather remedied by altering the system of examination.

836. In what way?—I should be very much disposed to make the examination in the first instance very light, almost nominal; I would confine it to French and ability to write a good hand, and of course to write English properly.

837. You consider French essential?—I consider French essential for anyone, even for the lowest possible rank. Then after that I should have the real examination at a later period; but I should try to put it back as far as possible; in fact, till the men were likely to become second secretaries, and without requiring it for the third secretaries.

838. Your view, then, would be to test a man's attainments in the profession?—Yes, to test his attainments in the profession, and if possible to get rid of some of the incompetent men that you must have entering all professions. And I would try to make that examination as real as possible, and not give men time as at present to come home and prepare for it, which means to cram.

839. What takes place now in regard to that?—A young gentleman is told that he is to prepare for examination, and he gets three months' leave generally, when he comes home for the express purpose of cramming, and goes to a professional crammer, who puts him in the way of being able to get through his examination. I would try to make the examination real, if I possibly could.

840. You would take a man more upon a sudden, and then test his knowledge of the business of the profession?—Yes. He probably would have no chance of being made a second secretary till he had been eight or ten years in the profession. I would say that at the end of six or eight years, or any period that you choose to fix upon, he should be liable to have to come home and pass his examination. I would call him home and put him through it without any warning whatever.

841. If he could not get through that test, you would shelve him, I suppose?—Then I would shelve him; and very likely those who were conscious of being incompetent, and were not disposed to take the pains that they ought to take, would voluntarily make way for better men below them.

842. What is your opinion of the general effects of the examination, apart from the shutting out of a number of gentlemen who formerly entered the profession, as to the qualification of those who pass it?—I think that there is very little difference in the qualification except as to languages. They are much better in their French now than they used to be.

843. As regards class of life, I presume that the men are very much the same as they were before?—They are very much the same, because they are taken from exactly the same class of life.

844. They are nominated by the Secretary of State?—They are nominated by the Secretary of State, who naturally takes them from among people with whom he has some acquaintance.

845. As the head of the diplomatic service of Constantinople, you have the superintendence of all the Eastern consulates, have you not?—Yes.

846. How many consuls are there under you?—Taking consuls and vice-consuls, I suppose that there are about 50, but I do not know the exact number.

847. Do these persons correspond directly with you?—They correspond directly with me. They write direct to the Foreign Office also, but they send a copy of their despatch to me, or they write direct to me and send a copy of their despatch to me to the Foreign Office. It is done sometimes one way and sometimes the other.

848. Do you get a copy of every letter sent by them to the Foreign Office?—Yes.

849. Whether it involves the transaction of business with the Porte or not?—Yes, everything of importance.

850. Is there a large amount of business with the Porte consequent upon that correspondence?—There is a great deal consequent upon it; our commercial business is very heavy at Constantinople.

851. Could you give any general idea of the proportion of commercial business to the political business?—I suppose that last year I probably wrote to the Foreign Office between 500 and 600 numbered political despatches, and about 100 commercial ones; I should think that it was within 20 or 30 of those numbers.

852. Have you ever considered the question of the partial amalgamation or interchange of service between the consular and the diplomatic services?—I do not think that the amalgamation would be advantageous; I should not like to debar the Secretary of State from the right of taking a man who in the consular service had shown himself to be a very capable person, and putting him into the diplomatic service; and I should be very sorry indeed to see any rule drawn which should prevent him from doing so, but I do not think that it would be advantageous to make it a practice. The lines of duty in the two services are very distinct, and it would not be advantageous to have a consul trying to bring himself into notice as a political writer. In the French service, where it is done a great deal, I have seen that effect produced; a consul thinks that he will make for himself a political name, and he writes with that object, and, I think, impairs his usefulness as a consul in consequence.

Right Hon. Sir H. G. Elliot, G.C.B.

24 March 1870.

853. He comparatively neglects his commercial duties?—Yes; he takes himself out of his proper line.

854. Do they interchange much in the French service?—They do so more than we do; and it is only fair to say that some of their very able men in the diplomatic service have been taken from the consular service,

855. I think that in our diplomatic service there are some gentlemen who have been consuls?—Yes.

856. We have had a suggestion made to us that it would be possible to place some of the attachés who are not likely to go up in the diplomatic service in consular posts; do you think that that would work?—I think that in a report which I believe is printed, I made a suggestion that for the future it might be possible, in the new appointments, to let the attachés understand that if they were found to be more fitted for the consular service, the Secretary of State should have the right to draft them into that service; but you cannot do that fairly with those who are now in the service, because they understood that they were going into the diplomatic, and not into the consular line.

857. In that answer to Lord Clarendon's circular, you suggested that there might be a reduction amongst the diplomatic staff, you think, in the subordinate departments; do you think that that could be carried out?—I think that the best way of preventing a block is by keeping your junior staff as low as it possibly can be kept, being efficient at the same time; and certainly my experience would lead me to believe that at a great many missions the staff is higher than is required if the men are kept really at work.

858. You have been at St. Petersburg, I believe?—I was an attaché at St. Petersburg between seven and eight years, and certainly for one whole winter (which in Russia is rather a long period). I was the only working hand.

859. How many hands were there?—There were nominally two others, but they were both absent the whole winter.

860. And were you able to keep the work under?—Yes, but then the work has very much increased since that time; I am not saying that three would be too many now.

861. Still at that time one efficient subordinate did the work of the mission?—Yes, it was hard work, still it could be done perfectly well.

862. Probably it was not harder work than you had to do as précis writer in the Foreign Office?—No, certainly not.

863. Have you not been at Vienna also?—I was secretary of legation at Vienna, and there there were great complaints of over-work (I think there were four juniors besides myself); and I never thought that those complaints were very well founded. I recollect saying to them, "Now, if you will attend a certain number of hours" (which was not a very great number), "coming regularly at such a time in the forenoon, and go away at such a time in the afternoon, I will guarantee that with your present number you shall each have a holiday in rotation once a week."

864. Was that arrangement made?—No, I believe that they preferred going on in the same rather irregular way as before.

865. I think that you have been at the Hague?—Yes, at the Hague the work was certainly not more than one man could do. But the difficulty, if you have only one in a place where there is not a great deal of work, is with regard to the leave, because you must give that man leave of absence. I think that that could perhaps be met by sending some one either from the Foreign Office or from some other mission where all the attachés happen to be present, to fill up the place during the two months' leave that the secretary might be entitled to. I should not think that it was necessary to keep two men to do the work of one, because that one man has a right to two months' leave in the year.

866. Do you think that it would be possible to have a sort of flying staff to go about where there was extra work?—I should think it would be an economical arrangement, and an equally efficient one if they were to have enough men at the Foreign Office to be able to detach some for special services. They might calculate that there are so many missions at which one man will be absent for a time, and they might provide persons that could be spared from the office to go to those missions when necessary.

867. You agree, I understand, that there is a decided block in the service?—There is no question about that. The younger men now in the service have a prospect of being ministers by the time that they are about 65.

868. That is the best thing that a man can hope for?—That is the best thing that a man can hope for, supposing it all to go by seniority; but, of course, it does not go by seniority in the higher branches, and a man may save perhaps five or six years by being selected before others, in which case he might become a minister at 60.

869. Do you think it for the advantage of the public service, that a man can only attain one of the chief posts at that age?—No, I think it a great disadvantage, because if you happen to get in your service a man of at all exceptional or superior abilities, you lose his services during the best years of his life; when I say "lose his services," I mean you employ him in a very subordinate position. I think that the seniority system has been carried a great deal too far in that respect. I think that the service has fallen off from what it was before. Formerly there was not the same distrust of the Secretary of State that there is at present. At present, if a man is passed over, there is a disposition to suppose that it is not done for the public service, but that it is done for the purpose of bringing on some favourite. The Secretary of State is afraid of that, and therefore he now promotes entirely by seniority, up to the higher branches. We used formerly to see a man who was known in the service (although perhaps not known in England) to be not fit for promotion, rise to be a secretary of legation at one of the inferior courts, and there he remained for his lifetime, and never moved; he was, in fact, shelved; he did his work there, but it was never thought necessary to put him into one of the higher places. That used to be the practice; but now the pressure re upon the Secretary of State has become so eat, that these people who, I think, ought to main in places of very small importance, are w pushed forward to posts in which we ought have better men.

870. Speaking generally, has this state of ings, do you think, created discontent and satisfaction in the junior branches of the ser- ce?—The service is very much changed since first belonged to it. When I was an attaché d secretary, it was before the days of the oreign Office list. We scarcely knew who ere in the service; we did not know their names respective seniorities; we thought very little out it, and we took things as they came.

871. Now these things are studied?—Now ese things are studied, and the service of every an is weighed and commented upon.

872. I see that in your reply to Lord Clarendon, you state the general opinion that, as gards the salaries, the heads of missions have great reason to complain?—Not according to y experience. But then since I was in some the missions, the prices have got up very uch indeed; and whether it is from the gradual nd steady increase of prices or not, I cannot ay, but I have found that with every successive se in the profession, it was more difficult to live pon the salary attached to it, though it was much arger than the salary attached to the position I ad left. Still I have always found that I could ive properly upon my salary.

873. You were fortunate enough to begin as a aid attaché?—Yes.

874. Was your pay at that time sufficient to maintain you in a proper position?—No, not half sufficient. I should observe, that St. Petersburgh, at that time, was not nearly as expensive s it is now. My salary then was 300*l.* a year, nd I spent about 400*l.* a year in addition o that; altogether between 600*l.* and 700*l.* a year.

875. The salary of the first paid officer, the hird secretary, now is 150*l.*?—Yes; he would ot have been paid at all formerly; he would still have been an unpaid attaché. But though I think that the salary of the chief is sufficient certainly without being too much), I do not think the same of the juniors; I do not speak so much of the third secretaries, but I do think that the second secretaries, and secretaries of legation should be better paid, and more particularly if you were to make a severe examination, such as I should like to see for the second secretaries, I should, after that, let them have a very much higher salary than they have at present.

876. You would combine that, I understand, with a reduction of the number of the public servants? — I should gradually reduce the number, and pay each of the second secretaries a great deal more than they have at present.

877. With regard to the extraordinary expenses, is any allowance made for unusual and incidental expenses at the Constantinople mission?—Speaking from my own experience since I have been chief of the mission, I never received a shilling for any extraordinary expenditure which I have been put to.

878. There has been lately a great State ceremony at Constantinople; has that expense fallen upon you?—You allude to the time when the Prince of Wales was there; it fell upon me, naturally, every shilling of it.

879. With regard to the dragomans, a good deal of your business with the Porte is done through the medium of dragomans, is it not?—A great deal of our work is done by means of dragomans; it is a totally different system from that prevailing in any other European Court. We have two kinds of dragomans (and I believe all the other embassies have the same system); we have first a confidential dragoman, as he is called, who transacts your political business.

880. Is he in possession of all the secrets of the mission?—I should say, generally speaking, all. First of all he must be in possession of a great deal, and I believe that if you employ people at all in confidential places, half confidence is very much misplaced: you had better put your entire confidence in a man, and trust to him. I do not mean to say that if I were to have a confidential conversation with the Grand Vizier I should think it necessary to go and repeat it to the dragoman, but I should not conceal the state of things from him, if it were a matter in which he was at all engaged.

881. What functions does he discharge?—There are a great many communications which are constantly passing between the Turkish Government and the foreign Governments; there has been, from time immemorial, a sort of system of receiving from the Porte information of all that is going on with other Governments, and the information which they get from their own provinces, and, in fact, everything that is interesting of a political nature they generally communicate to the friendly courts; and the dragoman attends upon the Grand Vizier, or rather upon the Minister of Foreign Affairs, every day, and sees if there is any communication that he wishes to make.

882. He goes to the waiting-room, I suppose?—He goes to the waiting-room, and then he is known to be there, and he is called in, and the minister tells him that he has nothing to say to him, or he gives him some piece of information, and receives any similar communication that may be sent to him by the ambassador.

883. Is that a daily occurrence?—Yes.

884. Then he comes and reports to the ambassador?—Yes, he comes and reports; I get a daily report from the dragoman of his interview with the minister.

885. In writing, or vivâ voce?—In writing. Very often there are despatches which the Turkish Government have received from their own agents abroad, and they wish to let us know what they have heard; then the minister desires him to go to an under secretary and get a copy of the despatch or the substance of the despatch, and that is communicated to us; then, on other matters, I go myself to the minister or the Grand Vizier and discuss the questions that may have arisen.

886. Mr. Hammond has told us that upon questions of high policy Turkish officers of state are now generally able to communicate in French, and that there is less confidence placed in the dragoman in consequence than used to be formerly?—The dragoman has not such an important part to play since the ministers can speak French, but it is quite impossible to dispense with his services; an ambassador may go to the Porte whenever there is any business to be done, but he cannot go there simply to ask if the minister has got anything to tell him.

887. There is one gentleman appointed of that first class of dragomans?—Yes, there is one head dragoman; dragoman; then from the very awkward way in which business is done at the Porte, we have to employ other dragomans in a great many private cases of claims and things of that kind, of which unfortunately we have a great number; you never can get a case of any kind brought to a conclusion unless you keep a dragoman going from one department to another. The state of confusion and the difficulty of getting cases to an end, you would understand from the simple fact that every document which comes to the Foreign Office at Constantinople (not only the Foreign Office but the Grand Vizier's office and the Minister of the Interior's) is carried there every morning and removed from there every night in large boxes; it is carried to a fire-proof building apart from where the ministers work and from where all the clerks are, so that every paper is put into a box, and there are 200 or 300 porters that carry these boxes away every day, morning and evening.

Right Hon. Sir H. G. Elliot, K.C.B.

24 March 1870.

888. That must make it almost impossible to despatch cases?—Yes, and it shows one why with the best will in the world business goes very slowly there; and unless you have a dragoman watching, you may say, the vagaries of each of the documents which you have to deal with, in a little time, after a few journeys backwards and forwards, it is very difficult to trace it.

889. How many of these subordinate dragomans have you?—We have four dragomans altogether; but I suggested that we could now, owing to the cession of the Ionian Islands, suppress one of our dragomans.

890. That cession relieves you of a considerable amount of business?—Yes.

891. Are these gentlemen Greeks?—Our chief dragoman is Pisani; he is of Italian origin; a Levantine.

892. It is an hereditary office, is it not, almost?—His family have been connected with the English Embassy for a great number of years. Then the second is English in his name, but I fancy that he was born in the East. The third is of Italian origin, and the fourth is the son of our late consul at Brussa, an Englishman.

893. Have you any member of the mission who is able to talk Turkish?—Yes, we have two. We have our Oriental secretary, Mr. Hughes, who is a good Turkish scholar, and can translate Turkish, and we have Mr. Moore, whose father was consul general in Syria for many years, and who is an admirable linguist.

894. Have they come into the service in the ordinary fashion?—Mr. Hughes did not; he was one of the student attachés appointed a great many years ago. He is the only one of them remaining. Four, I think, were appointed.

895. They were intended to be substituted for the dragomans, were they not?—They were, but the system did not answer, and I very much regret it.

896. You think it was a better plan?—I think it was better, but it is an extremely difficult combination that we want. You get a young man from England, and by hard study at Turkish he will be able, after a certain number of years, to translate accurately; but it does not at all follow that he is fit to be taken as a dragoman to translate at an interview with the Sultan; the colloquial Turkish and the written Turkish are so totally different. And a very good dragoman in some respects, a man fitted to translate well at a conversational interview, might be quite incompetent to translate a Turkish document.

897. A good interpreter might be a bad translator, and vice versâ?—Yes.

898. What do the French and Russian missions do; do they follow the same system?—Yes, they follow the same system. The French recently appointed their first dragoman as conseiller d'ambassade, who takes the place of his chief when he is away. But I do not think that it is at all an advisable proceeding; the dragoman has not a position in the country which makes him sufficiently respected as the head of the embassy.

899. They do not occupy the same social position as the other members of the mission?—They are not looked upon in the same way.

900. Have you a large mass of archives at Constantinople?—Well, fortunately about 20 years ago there was a fire that burnt everything in the embassy, so that our archives have only accumulated since that time.

901. Have you anybody placed especially in charge of them?—We have a keeper of the archives, a most valuable public officer, who has been many years in that position.

902. I suppose he is more in the character of a clerk than of an attaché?—By the regulation he is the head of the chancery, and directs everything; he apportions out the work to the others.

903. Did he come in as an ordinary member of the mission originally, or as a permanent officer?—He is a permanent officer; he has been permanent for nearly 50 years.

904. If anything were to happen to him, what would be done?—We should have to try to find somebody to fill the place. We have a very large number of documents put into our hands every year, and it requires a permanent officer to know where the papers are which are 10 or 15 years old.

905. I suppose you are constantly wanting to refer to former documents?—Yes.

906. Has he anybody in training now under him to learn the business?—No. If he were to go it would be a great inconvenience till his successor made himself really master of the state of the archives.

907. Is he paid out of the extraordinaries?—He is paid out of the extraordinaries as all our dragomans are also. Our extraordinaries are very high, partly owing to the number of salaries that are paid out of them; the dragomans, this keeper of the archives, the chaplain, and the doctor. Then there is another charge under the extraordinaries for the keeper of the military cemetery on the Bosphorus, and various others.

908. Do you communicate a great deal with the Foreign Office by telegram?—Yes, whenever there is anything that it seems important that they should know sooner than they could learn it by post.

909. Do you think that that facilitates business very much?—I think that the telegraph is very far from facilitating business. I think that it makes business much more difficult than it was formerly.

910. How so?—Because formerly you had a despatch expressing the views and opinions of the Foreign Office upon a complete case. Now very likely the Secretary of State has to form his opinion upon imperfect telegraphic information that you may have sent yourself or that somebody else may have sent, and he writes a telegram telegram which you have to understand; and I think even persons who receive private telegrams find how very difficult it is to understand accurately all that is intended to be conveyed by them. The responsibility of ministers is very much diminished of course, but I think that the difficulty of carrying on business is greater now than it was before.

911. To go back to a previous question; speaking from your own experience of other large missions, do you think it would be a good plan to have a permanent officer in charge of the records in the nature of a clerk?—I think that in the large missions it would enable you to diminish your diplomatic staff if you had a permanent officer. There is another way by which I think perhaps you might also arrive at the same result to a great extent. In all the larger missions I believe the minister or ambassador wants a private secretary, and I do not exactly see why he should not have an allowance for a private secretary, as a Cabinet Minister has in England, and take one not in the service.

912. You mean one personally attached to him?—Personally attached to him. At present we generally take somebody belonging to the embassy, and that naturally withdraws him from his ordinary work.

913. I suppose you take one of the junior members of the embassy?—I have one of the second secretaries.

914. His pay would be 300*l.* a year?—Yes; if you allowed a minister 300*l.* a year for a private secretary, with the understanding that he is not to take anybody belonging to the embassy, I think then you might reduce your permanent staff.

915. Take Constantinople, could you reduce the number of the second secretaries if you had a private secretary?—Yes; it would be no economy, and it is not as a measure of economy that I propose it, because he would have as private secretary the same pay as a second secretary, but it is merely to prevent the block, and to relieve the service.

916. Is there anything else that you would like to mention to the Committee?—Nothing else that strikes me at this moment.

917. Mr. Rylands.] Is it your opinion that in the larger missions a plan might be adopted of having permanent clerks to do the ordinary routine work of the mission, such as the copying?—I think that the ordinary copying is as much of a confidential employment as anything else that a clerk can have to do, and I think that you must have people in whom you can repose entire confidence; there is nothing in the work itself that could not be done by a person of very ordinary acquirements.

918. Is it your opinion that, in the case of the unpaid attachés, from your practical experience, if they were paid salaries, you would be able to get regular work from them?—I never could find any difference between the work of the paid and that of the unpaid attachés; I think the unpaid attachés worked quite as satisfactorily as the paid. I must say for them, that I have often heard them say that it was hard to remain so long without being paid, but I never saw any backwardness in them in doing their work.

919. I think I understood from you, in reference both to the paid and to the unpaid secretaries and attachés, that there was a want of regularity of work in the large missions?—There is a great amount of irregularity, and partly, no doubt, it is the fault of the system, there not being a very strict discipline over them, but partly, also, it is in consequence of the way in which work comes into the embassy. I have known three or four days pass, at large embassies, without anything coming in at all, and then on the following day there might be an influx that would keep all hands at work. But still it was not generally necessary that all that should be cleared off at once, and by more regular attendance they could get through it with a less staff. I ought, however, to say that those who are at the head of those missions are much more competent to speak on that point than I am; I can only speak of those I have been at, and of the time when I was there.

920. Do not you think that the fact that secretaries of legations are changed so much from one post to another, interferes with that knowledge of the documents in the chancery, which would otherwise be possessed by the secretaries of legation?—I think it is a very great advantage that they should be frequently changed. I think I gave that evidence before the last Committee, that the more they are changed the more useful public servants you make of them. Occasionally you put a minister to inconvenience from having a new hand brought in, but as far as the service is concerned I am sure it is a gainer by a man getting experience in as many courts as possible.

921. Still the effect would be that if a secretary of legation remained at a post for some considerable period, he would be likely to know better the state of the archives, and the papers contained in them?—No doubt the longer he stays in a place the more he ought to know of the state of the chancery, and of the place. But with regard to the changes, the secretaries of legation are generally kept a considerable time at one post; the two years' system only applies to the juniors of the chancery, and the next man under the minister generally stays a very considerable time.

922. I think I understood you to say that if a permanent officer were appointed to keep the archives in the principal missions, it would render it possible to reduce the number of secretaries of legation?—That is my opinion.

923. Would it reduce the second or third secretaries of legation?—I should think that it would reduce the juniors; but you must have your two classes in proportion to each other, so as to give them fair promotion. It depends upon what proportion you think proper to keep them in.

924. At present, where there is no keeper of the archives, whose duty would it be to attend to that?—The senior second secretary's.

925. With regard to the extraordinary expenditure in Constantinople, as to the salaries of the dragomans, I think I am right in supposing that those salaries have not been reduced during the last 20 years?—They have not been reduced, and I should be very glad if they could be increased, because I see a prospect of our losing some of our very best men from the prospect of their getting much more advantageous terms from other parties. It is an alarm that I feel very strongly.

926. The head dragoman, Mr. Pisani, to whom you have alluded, gets, how much?—The head dragoman gets, I think, 900*l.* a year.

927. We are clearly to understand from your

Right Hon. Sir H. G. Elliot, G.C.B.

24 March 1870.

evidence that, notwithstanding the communications between the Porte and the ambassador being very much more frequently now in French, the necessity for an extremely confidential dragoman is the same?—In my opinion just the same as ever. I do not think it is possible to do without him. In my report I have said that I do not think that there is a necessity both for a confidential dragoman and for an Oriental secretary; I think that the work could be done with one.

928. You think that we could dispense with the Oriental secretary, keeping up otherwise the present staff?—I think that you could dispense with one or the other. But then we have always to remember in an important place like Constantinople that you must not only make an arrangement that will work for to-day or to-morrow, but that you must have something to fall back upon in case of accident. If you had not Mr. Hughes, for instance (not that I suppose that there would ever be a question of dismissing a man who had been 20 years in the service); Mr. Pisani is a man about 65 or 66, I should think. You do not know how long you may be able to carry on the business with him; it is very severe. He has to go five days a week to the Porte, either riding over those wretched roads in the winter or going in the summer in his caique, whatever the weather is, and a man of that age may break down at any time. If you were to try to get rid of Mr. Pisani that would be no economy, for he is entitled to a pension, I believe, within 50*l.* of the amount of his salary.

929. But supposing that a vacancy occurred in the position of Oriental secretary?—I should not think it necessary that the two places should be filled up.

930. With regard to the other dragomans, one junior might be dispensed with, you think?—Yes.

931. And also one of the second secretaries?—Yes.

932. Mr. William Lowther.] With regard to the subject of pensions, formerly a man who became attaché had no claim at all to a pension till he became secretary?—No, his claim for a pension dated from the date of his first commission, which he only got on being made secretary of legation.

933. Do you know any cases of men remaining nine or 10 years attachés, formerly?—I can recollect that that used to happen in the earliest periods. I recollect men that were in the service when I was at school that were eight or 10 years attachés.

934. Then, after being in the service 15 years, a man has a claim to a pension?—A man is qualified for a pension.

935. Therefore, you having been made secretary in 1848, if you had retired in 1863 you would have had a claim to a pension?—If I had retired in 1863 I should have been qualified for a pension.

936. I think that at one time there was a clerk kept at Naples, was there not?—Yes.

937. How did that system act?—I am afraid the clerk did rather more than his share of the attaché's work at that time.

938. Do you think it would be safe to trust clerks in Russia?—I should be very sorry to see it tried. To show the importance of getting people that you can thoroughly trust, I may say that I was told once by one of the staff of the embassy to which I belonged (it was at a time when most important negotiations were going on), that he had had a direct offer of 10,000*l.* a year for giving early information.

939. Mr. Cartwright. Was that in Russia?—No, it was not in Russia.

940. Mr. William Lowther.] Do you know of any instances of confidence having been betrayed by any subordinates?—Certainly no instance of that has come within my own knowledge.

941. Are the despatches in your archives bound?—Yes.

942. Bound every year?—We had them bound last year; I do not think that they had been bound for about three years previously, and I think we bound four years then.

943. And they are charged in the extraordinaries?—Yes.

944. Do you ever destroy any papers?—No, at least nothing that there is any prospect of requiring again.

945. There seems to be an idea that the use of the telegraph diminishes the work of the head of a mission; do you think that it increases it or diminishes it?—I am sure it increases it; I do not think that that admits of a question.

946. If you have more work, have you not also a greater amount of responsibility?—No; I think you have less responsibility, because now if you are asked to act in a particular way, you can refer to the Secretary of State to know what you are to do; whereas formerly, in many cases, you would have had to decide for yourself.

947. You generally make an application by telegraph in cipher?—Yes; we make an application by telegraph in cipher, and say that such and such things have been said, and ask what are the views of Her Majesty's Government.

948. And you receive an answer to that in cipher?—Yes.

949. And are the questions always intelligible this side, and the answers always intelligible your side?—No; I think now and then there are questions and answers that are not exactly what they would have been if the despatches had been fully written, not so distinct, certainly.

950. With regard to private secretaries, I think some years ago a rule was made that no man should be a private secretary who was not an attaché?—I am not aware of such a rule.

951. You think that now it would be a good thing to have private secretaries who are not attachés?—I think that if you had private secretaries in the four or five larger missions, it would enable you to diminish the permanent staff, and so give a fairer chance of promotion to those who remained in it.

952. But then would there not be continually questions arising between the private secretary and the junior secretaries, as to whether a thing was their business or not their business?—I do not think so.

953. Your experience does not tell you that that has given rise to quarrels and jealousies?—No; I think among gentlemen you see a very general disposition to pull well together.

964. With regard to increasing the salaries of the dragomans, have you ever asked the Foreign Office for any increase, or put it before them?—I have suggested an increase.

965. And they did not see it in that light?—They have not been able in all times to make the increase.

956. You do not know whether the Foreign Office has applied to the Treasury on the subject?

ject?—I do not know anything of what passes between the Foreign Office and the Treasury. I receive the orders from the Foreign Office, and they keep their secrets to themselves.

957. You propose that the staff at Constantinople should be reduced, I think, by a dragoman?—A dragoman and a second secretary to be reduced, and the Oriental secretary or another dragoman when an opportunity might offer.

958. You look upon these times now as calm times, do you not; not very much going on?—Yes, they are calm times.

959. But in time of any great crisis, would you not have to increase the staff?—We might have possibly to increase the staff, but then a time of crisis would throw a great deal of additional work upon the head of the embassy, and I should expect the juniors to be prepared for some extra work too.

960. But could a dragoman be found then?—I think the reductions I suggest would leave us a sufficient margin. I could get people competent to act as dragomans on an emergency.

961. Mr. Otway.] You are the ambassador at Constantinople?—Yes.

962. You have been engaged lately in delicate negotiations with the Porte sometimes, have you not, on political questions?—Yes, on various questions.

963. You have had personal audiences of the Sultan?—Frequently.

964. His will is very powerful in Turkey in regulating political matters?—Yes, he can do anything he chooses to do.

965. Does the Sultan speak French?—No.

966. You could not have had those audiences with the Sultan by right, except in your position as an ambassador?—Except as an ambassador I should not be entitled to ask for an audience, I might beg it, but I could not ask for it; and he might make an excuse if I were not an ambassador.

967. So far as you have been able therefore to exert influence in the councils of the Porte, you have done so in your capacity of ambassador?—Yes.

968. The other Great Powers also maintain ambassadors there?—Within the last few years both Russia and Austria have raised their representatives to the rank of ambassadors; the Russians did it about four years ago, and the Austrians about two.

969. With regard to the dragomans, is it necessary that the dragoman should go every day to the Porte to ascertain whether the Porte has anything to tell him; is that conducive to the service?—Yes, I think it is extremely conducive to the public service; all Orientals, I believe, have a habit of speaking more unreservedly to the people whom they see daily; and I believe that many a minister will say things to the dragoman which he knows the dragoman will repeat, and which he means the dragoman to repeat to his chief, which he would not say to him face to face. I am quite sure that that is the case with a great many of the Turkish ministers.

970. You apply that especially to the Turkish minister?—Yes.

971. I ask that question because the practice does not prevail at any other embassy or mission of sending somebody to the ministers of state with the view of acquiring any information that they may like to give them?—Not daily, as we do; we send daily; and if we did not do so, but were to try to do without our dragomans, we should certainly be the worst informed embassy in Constantinople as to all that was going on both in the country and in foreign negotiations.

972. Still I conclude that if these duties could be performed by Englishmen in the diplomatic service it would be preferable?—I should decidedly prefer it.

973. Is there any difficulty inherent in the Turkish language which requires that we should have a Levantine, or some man other than an Englishman, to carry on intercourse both colloquially and by writing with the Porte?—No, there is no reason for it; only you must educate an Englishman specially for the purpose; and if you do that, you must be prepared to pay him during a considerable appenticeship, in which he will be simply learning his business and qualifying himself for the appointment which you mean to give him afterwards; and he must not only learn to be able to translate, but he must learn the colloquial Turkish so as to be able to interpret between you and the Sultan, or between you and the Turkish minister.

974. But I presume that there is no difficulty in the Turkish language that could not be mastered by an Englishman, as the Chinese and Japanese and other languages have been entirely mastered by under secretaries?—No doubt it could be mastered, and that was the intention of the student attachés that were appointed some 18 or 20 years ago, and certainly some of them became most distinguished linguists. Lord Strangford, was one of the most distinguished linguists we have had.

975. Mr. Hughes and Mr. Moore, whom you have mentioned, are both thoroughly competent to translate Turkish?—Yes.

976. I do not wish to individualize, but you no doubt have heard that there is an impression that the suits which British subjects may have with the Porte can be advanced or retarded according to the zeal or goodwill that the dragoman may show in his conduct of the business?—There is not a question about it. It depends very largely upon the dragoman. I should wish especially to be guarded against being supposed to say anything against our own dragoman; but the dragomans as a class do not stand high at Constantinople, and there are some nations which have dragomans who would never conduct a case unless they got a per-centage on what was to be got out of it.

977. A system such as that must cause entire want of confidence on the part of honest suitors who would not descend to any acts of that kind?—There are very few such, I am afraid. I recollect many years ago, in a country not celebrated for the administration of justice, asking a member of one of the chief English mercantile houses there about the commercial courts, and whether he had much difficulty in getting a case fairly decided, he said, "Well, when I first came here I spent a great deal in taking the dearest and best advocate, but I very soon found that I was much better to pay it direct to the judge."

978. Although that is an anecdote, that is amusing and may be true; it is not a satisfactory state of things, is it?—No. I only mentioned it in order to show that English houses of the very highest standing do not scruple to resort to the means to which we imagine that honest suitors would not descend.

979. I gathered

Right Hon. Sir H. G. Elliot, G.C.B. — 24 March 1870.

979. I gathered that you would infinitely prefer, from your experience of Constantinople, that the duties now falling on the dragomans should be discharged by English members of the service?—I do not think that it signifies as to the duties of the junior dragoman, but as to the political dragoman I should prefer it decidedly. With regard to the dragoman whose duty it is to go pressing the private claims of railroad companies, and so on, I do not think that it is necessary to have Englishmen for that duty.

980. And it is absolutely necessary that there should be some person to fill that office; you could not have the ambassador do that?—We should never get a case brought to a conclusion. It is quite impossible for an ambassador to go from one office to another hunting up a case. You would have to keep at least three ambassadors if you did away with the dragomans.

981. With regard to telegrams, is it not the fact that the omission of a single cipher may cause a very erroneous impression of the news sent, and may cause hours of work to the deciphering clerk?—I have seen telegrams arrive that took many hours to decipher, and sometimes could not be deciphered at all.

982. So that telegrams would really if not sent with singular accuracy, largely add to your labours?—Very greatly.

983. You were asked a question with regard to private secretaries. I think you suggest that the minister should have private secretary independent altogether of the embassy, and that he should not be in the service?—I do not suggest it for the convenience of the minister at all, but simply as a means of reducing the permanent diplomatic service, among which the promotions are to be divided.

984. You are aware that there is a rule at the Foreign Office that no one may be a private secretary in the Foreign Office who is not himself a member of that office?—That was not so formerly.

985. I am not aware that it extends to the Secretary of State, but with that exception is it not so?—Formerly when I was précis writer in the Foreign Office there was Mr. Howard and there was my brother George, who was with Lord Russell for many years.

986. Do not you think that it would be a disadvantage, considering the intelligence that passes through the hands of ambassadors that any one not connected with the profession should be in a position so confidential with regard to ministers of state, as that of a private secretary?—I do not see that there would be any inconvenience in that respect. The ambassador must feel that for his own security it is necessary for him to have a person in whom he has thorough confidence. He would not be at all likely to take any body whom he could not trust. It has been frequently done. Sir Henry Bulwer had a private secretary whom he selected for himself.

987. Have they access, do you think, to all the information conveyed to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs?—I presume they would have the custody of the minister's private letters, which must be as confidential as anything could be. I think that Sir Henry Bulwer was in the habit of dictating his letters, and I imagine that the private secretary would be the man to whom he dictated.

988. You see no objection to that system?—I do not see any objection to it.

989. To pass altogether from this to another branch of the subject. I want to know whether you can suggest any means by which the expenditure at Constantinople might be reduced. I allude to the expenditure for extraordinaries. The salaries naturally are fixed. Could you furnish us with a list of those expenses which are defrayed out of the extraordinaries?—The chief clerk could furnish them. Our extraordinaries have been greatly reduced in the last ten years; in 1859 they amounted to 12,680*l.*, and in 1869 to 9,618*l.*, notwithstanding a heavy increase in the fixed salaries charged upon them; in 1859 the aggregate of all expenses, exclusive of salaries, was 8,082*l.*, against 3,294*l.* in 1869, which, however, was an exceptionally high year; but the diminution is nevertheless of more than one-half as compared with the average amount eight or ten years ago. The fixed salaries now come to 6,309*l.* out of that 9,600*l.* Then after that came various items, boat and horse hire being the heaviest, and one which I do not see the possibility of reducing. I may say that our dragomans are continually employed, having constantly to be sent over to the Porte; and must either keep or hire horses. In summer everything is done in boats, and they must have boats to go from place to place to see the pachas. I do not see that that can be reduced. Then the telegraph account comes out of the extraordinaries, and that is a heavy item; and the postage is also heavy.

990. The postage you are unable to contract very much?—The postage it is impossible to contract very much.

991. You are dependent on the size and number of the letters in many cases sent to you?—A letter from some distant consulate, containing bulky official documents, may very easily cost 3*l.* or 4*l.* in postage.

992. Do you not think that there are many occasions on which these duplicates of despatches sent by the consuls should be sent by some cheaper conveyance than by the post?—If you trusted your despatches too much to opportunity or to private hands, it would not be advantageous.

993. Such opportunity as a vessel going, for instance?—Then you must find somebody to take charge of them. I think that you might reduce the postage by making the consuls pre-pay their letters and despatches, and repaying them; as it is we pay double.

994. Where no immediate action is necessary on the papers, why should you have duplicates of them sent by post?—For instance, if a mass of documents is sent to us from Bagdad, and they write to us to get some action from the Porte, and these documents do not come to hand, the consul general at Bagdad at the end of three months will write to us to know if any decision is come to with regard to these papers, and we have to write back to say that we have never received them.

995. You cannot suggest any diminution in that item, except pre-payment?—No.

996. As to boat hire?—The boat hire I do not think it is possible to reduce.

997. The garden expenses?—The garden expenses I took in hand about six months ago, and I think the arrangements that I made will reduce the garden expenses by about two thirds.

998. And at Therapia?—I include Therapia and the town in that.

999. Viscount

999. Viscount Barrington.] With regard to these dragomans of the second class, it has been suggested that Englishmen should fill their places; but would they not have to adopt the same means that the dragomans do of getting information?—In the case of the second class of dragomans, I do not see any advantage in changing. It is the work of the political dragoman that I should like to see in the hands of real Englishmen.

1000. It would be highly repugnant to an Englishman to adopt the means adopted by the second class of dragomans?—It is not the sort of work that he would like to carry on.

1001. I see from your printed letter that you do not think the amalgamation of the diplomatic and consular services would be desirable. May I ask what your reason is?—I think that it is undesirable to do anything that would take consuls out of their natural line, their purely commercial line, and make them aim at becoming politicians.

1002. It has been suggested that attachés up to a certain grade, I mean until they became secretaries, should take the post of consuls. Do you think that that would create any jealousy amongst the gentlemen who already occupy the post of vice consul, and may expect to be promoted?—No, I do not think that it would. At first it sounds as if it would be unfair upon the vice consuls to give diplomatists the consulships that these other gentlemen may be expecting; but, in point of practice, the large majority of consuls are not appointed from the vice consuls, but from outsiders altogether; and I see, in a pamphlet written on the diplomatic service the other day, that in the consular service there are no less than 85 who have never been vice consuls. Therefore, I do not think that it would be an injury to the vice consuls if you took young diplomatists, instead of taking ex-military or naval officers, or any of the other persons who at present get those posts.

1003. Have you thought whether it would be a good thing to throw open the post of attachés to open competition?—Yes, I have often thought of that, and I think that it would not answer at all. The first effect would be, that the position of an attaché would be very much changed on his arriving at his new post. At present an attaché is named, and you trust to the selection made by the Secretary of State, and you introduce that gentleman, without question, into the best families and houses in the place where you are; it is claimed of right, and nobody questions it. But if it was open to competition, I know, for my own part, that I should certainly not think myself justified in introducing into other people's houses a person of whom I knew nothing, except that he had passed successfully through an examination.

1004. Besides, he might not be a rich man, and then he could not live upon his pay?—At present it is absolutely necessary that anybody who comes into the diplomatic service should have at least 400*l.* or 500*l.* a year of his own.

1005. You said that you thought that the staffs at some of the missions might be reduced if clerks were sent more frequently from the Foreign Office?—I said that it was considered necessary in some places to keep two secretaries where one would be sufficient, in order to allow of one going on leave; and I said that I thought instead of keeping two men permanently there, it would be sufficient if a clerk were sent from the Foreign Office to fill up that place during the absence of the regular secretary.
